(b) Promising employees better jobs if they support the above-named labor organization in a Board-conducted election.

(c) Threatening to lay off half the employees and half the supervisors, and reduce salaries to $2.90 if Respondent loses the use of the IBEW label, thereby unlawfully restraining and coercing employees to vote for the above-named Union in a Board-conducted election.

(d) Threatening to lay off employees and reduce salaries if the employees try to put in a new union, thereby unlawfully restraining and coercing employees to vote for the above-named labor organization in a Board-conducted election.

(e) Threatening to move Respondent's plant to another location if the employees do not vote for the above-named labor organization in a Board-conducted election.

(f) Threatening that employees would have to start with minimum wages or at the bottom of Federal rates if the employees do not vote for the above-named labor organization in a Board-conducted election.

(g) Soliciting employee grievances to induce employees to vote for the above-named labor organization in a Board-conducted election.

(h) Threatening to call the Immigration Service if the employees vote for Independent Radionic Workers of America, affiliated with National Federation of Independent Unions of America, in a Board-conducted election.

(i) Threatening to discharge or otherwise discriminate against employees because of their support for the above-named Independent Radionic Workers of America.

(j) Informing employees that the loss of the IBEW label would result in the loss of business for Respondent because IBEW electricians on construction sites would not install Respondent's products, with a consequent loss of jobs for Respondent's employees.

(k) Informing employees that the company picnic was canceled because of the intention of nonemployee organizers for the Independent Radionic Workers of America to attend, thus causing a security problem.

(l) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Post at its plant in Elk Grove, Illinois, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix" printed both in English and Spanish.[4] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 13, after being duly signed by its representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director for Region 13, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

It is further ordered that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the National Labor Relations Act not found herein.

Halo Lighting Division of McGraw Edison Company

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Abraham Frank, Administrative Law Judge: The original charge in this consolidated case was filed on July 24, 1979.[1] A second charge was filed on September 12. The consolidated complaint, alleging violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, herein called the Act, issued on September 26. The hearing was held on various dates between March 4 and 21, 1980, inclusive, in Chicago, Illinois. All briefs filed have been considered.[2]

At issue in this case are questions whether Respondent engaged in various acts of interference, restraint, and coercion and unlawful assistance to the incumbent union during the course of an organizational campaign conducted by the Charging Party prior to a Board election on August 29. Also involved are the Petitioner's objections to the conduct of the election.

Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

I. PRELIMINARY FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

The Respondent, Halo Lighting Division of McGraw Edison Company, is engaged in the manufacture and distribution of lighting fixtures and related products at its plant in Elk Grove Village, Illinois, the only facility involved in this proceeding. During the last fiscal or calendar year Respondent manufactured, sold, and shipped finished products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located in States other than the State of Illinois.

[2] The joint motion of the parties to correct the exhibits and the General Counsel's motion to correct the transcript are granted.

I find that Respondent is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Independent Radionic Workers of America, affiliated with National Federation of Independent Unions of America, hereinafter the IRWA, and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 134, AFL-CIO, hereinafter the IBEW, are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. PREFACE

Halo, a then small manufacturing plant, was founded in 1955 and operated out of a single facility on North Orchard Street in Chicago, Illinois. Dan T. Thomson, president of the commercial products group of McGraw Edison Company and president of Halo Lighting Division of McGraw Edison Company at times material herein, was one of the original three employees. Then, as now, the Company manufactured incandescent lighting fixtures, at that time its only product line.

Halo began operations as an unorganized plant. Its first major commercial sale for incandescent fixtures was made to the Harry S. Truman Memorial Library in Independence, Missouri. After the fixtures arrived at the jobsite, the Company was informed that the contractor and the electricians on the job were refusing to install the fixtures because they did not bear the IBEW label. The Company sought counsel, contacted the IBEW, and shortly thereafter its employees were represented by that Union. Since then Respondent, as a member of the Chicago Lighting Equipment Manufacturing Association, has had a continuous bargaining relationship with the IBEW covering its production and maintenance employees under a series of contracts, the last of which terminated on August 31.

Sometime in 1979 a number of Respondent's employees, including most, if not all of the IBEW stewards, particularly the chief steward, Jesus Gonzalez, became dissatisfied with the representatives assigned by the IBEW to serve the employees at the Halo plant. Gonzalez and other employees contacted the IRWA with the view of establishing that Union as their collective-bargaining representative in place of the IBEW. On June 8 the IRWA filed its petition in this case. Thereafter, Ed Lane and Elizer Medina, the then representatives for the IBEW, were replaced by Joe Kingsley and Roy L. Cortes. Cortes, a business representative of Local 1031, IBEW, was assigned to Local 134 for work at the Halo plant during the 3-month period prior to the election of August 29. A large proportion of Respondent's employees are of Hispanic origin and fluent only in Spanish. Cortes speaks English and Spanish and communicated with all employees in either language.

From June 5, the date the IRWA began its campaign, until August 29, the date of the Board election, Respondent and both Unions campaigned vigorously. Respondent supported the reelection of the IBEW by means of, inter alia, a series of written communications to its employees and a final speech by Thomson on August 23 to the employees. Respondent stressed particularly its concern that the loss of the IBEW label on its lighting fixtures would result in a loss of business and a loss of a great number of jobs.[3]

On July 19 Thomson wrote the employees that bargaining would start from the beginning with a new union and the employees could lose the wages and benefits they now had if they elected the IRWA. On July 25 Thomson pointed out to the employees that the IRWA was losing money and that the employees the IRWA represented at Zenith had lost about 12,500 jobs since 1968; that representation of the employees by the IRWA at Halo could cause the Company to lose business and many of the employees lose their jobs. On July 31 Thomson pointed out to the employees that Respondent had expanded from 200 employees in 1968 to 1,100 employees in 1979 and asked the employees to compare Halo's growth to the IRWA's decline and jobs lost at Zenith. On August 2 Thomson responded to an IRWA bulletin of August 1, stating that it was not true that the IRWA represented journeymen electricians and repeated Respondent's opinion that the loss of the IBEW label could drastically reduce the number of fixtures sold, which could mean a significant loss in sales, resulting in a loss of jobs for many employees at Halo.

On August 10 Thomson again called for support of the IBEW. He stated that the IRWA was not a recognized electrical union and their label did not mean anything to Halo's customers, that thousands of IRWA members had lost their jobs. In an August 20 memo Thomson informed the employees that a group of Northwest Airlines employees had switched from an AFL-CIO union to an independent union and then stated that it took the new union a year and a half to negotiate the first contract, that the pay increase, although retroactive, was not received by the employees for 20 months, and that the new contract left the employees behind the pay and benefits given by other airlines. The memo concluded with the question, "Could these things happen here?"

On August 22 Thomson again challenged the truth of statements made by the IRWA, asserting that the IRWA had lost benefits for its members in the first contract negotiated after the sale of Zenith's hearing aid division, setting out specific lost benefits with an attached chart. In a final memo on August 28 Thomson reminded the employees that the then-current contract with the IBEW would expire on August 31 and that the employees' failure to choose the IBEW in the election of August 29 would mean that the Company would lose the right to display the IBEW label on its fixtures, a result that "could hurt both of us."

[3] In a letter dated July 6 Thomson wrote:

> We think it is important that you know how your Company feels about the decision you will be making and how it could affect your future. It is our sincere believe [sic] that it would be a serious mistake for our employees to vote for a change in their bargaining representative because if they do, it would mean that we could no longer affix the IBEW label to our products. Our present relationship with the IBEW, as your exclusive bargaining agent, enables us to place their union label on all the products we manufacture and it is especially important to the sale of Halo, Lite-Trend, and Power Trac assembly fixtures. IBEW electricians have, in some instances, refused to install "non-IBEW labelled fixtures." We are convinced if we lost the IBEW label it could affect a substantial part of our business and cause the loss of a great number of jobs.

On August 23 Thomson made a speech to the assembled employees. During the course of the speech Thomson said, inter alia, that outsiders were attempting to tear them apart and "at times I felt as though they just might be trying to force us to temporarily close the plant"; that, "if the IBEW label is lost, we all could lose"; that the IRWA had falsely stated that the IBEW journeymen electricians would not refuse to install the Company's fixtures if the IBEW lost the election; that the Company's competitors would like to see the IRWA win and the Company to lose the IBEW label, business, and jobs; that thousands of IRWA members at Zenith had lost their jobs in the past few years; and that Thomson did not want to see that happen at Halo.

The complaint does not allege that any of the above written communications or the August 23 speech is unlawful and the General Counsel so stated on the record. Nevertheless, the General Counsel takes the position that alleged unlawful statements orally made by supervisors and found to accord "exactly" to "Respondent's script" are unlawful.

Normally, the failure of the General Counsel to allege known conduct of Respondent within the 10(b) period as unlawful would preclude me from ruling on the legality of such conduct. The General Counsel's insistence, however, on litigating the legality of oral statements "exactly" the same as the written statements puts such statements, whether written or oral, in issue. An unlawful threat is unlawful whether written or spoken. Although awkwardly presented, the issue of Respondent's right under Section 8(c) of the Act to refer to the possible loss of the IBEW label and the consequent loss of business and jobs was fully litigated in this case.

The propriety of the Respondent's campaign literature is raised by the IRWA as an objection to the conduct of the election. However, the IRWA rested its case on the basis of the General Counsel's prima facie case of unfair labor practices. No evidence was offered challenging the accuracy of the facts and figures contained in Respondent's letters and communications to its employees.

III. THE FACTS

A. Interference, Restraint, and Coercion

1. Statements by supervisors

a. By Supervisor Tony Lizardi

Lizardi, a man of many talents, was, like many of Respondent's employees, of Puerto Rican origin. He was employed by Respondent as a supervisor in the shipping department during the campaign period from June to September. At the time of the hearing he was employed by the Department of Defense in the Defense Logistics Agency. Prior thereto he had been for a number of years a professor at the University of Puerto Rico, teaching labor law, labor history, accounting, finance, and business planning. In his varied occupations Lizardi had also managed a warehouse and had participated as part of management in dual union organizational campaigns.

Lizardi is fluent in English and Spanish. A loquacious and colorful individual, Lizardi undertook to educate Respondent's employees, some of whom spoke only Spanish, in the intricacies of labor law, including policies of the National Labor Relations Board, textbook references to the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Department, and the necessity for good-faith negotiations in collective bargaining. In his many conversations with individuals and groups of employees, Lizardi stressed particularly the necessity to retain the IBEW label and the possibility of extended negotiations if a new contract had to be negotiated with a new union. So erudite and forceful were Lizardi's arguments that several employees would shout when they saw Lizardi approaching, "Hey, don't talk to Tony. He's going to make you dizzy, he's going to make you dizzy." At times Lizardi would drive home his point with an understandable metaphor. Speaking of the negotiating process, he explained it was like trying to convince a girl. "If you've gone out with her once and you nail her down there, you know the second time around it's going to be easier than the first time. You had to work real hard at it, didn't you?"

According to Lizardi and contrary to the testimony of witnesses for the General Counsel, he made no threats or promises to the employees to induce them to vote for the IBEW rather than the IRWA. He told them there was no way the salary matter could be touched before a Board election. When the employees argued they did not need the IBEW label he told them, "[I]f the lamps do not go out on the truck, because they do not order, the clients do not order, there is no need to do any one of them. If there is no need to need any lamps, there is no need for people to build lamps. And this would affect us all including me." In explaining Respondent's letter of August 20, relating to the strike at Northwest Airlines, Lizardi pointed out that in that case the Teamsters, a newly elected union, did not even manage to get the same benefits that the industry had or that the employees had under a different union. If the employees elected a new union at Halo, "negotiations could carry on for God knows how long" since all the contract language would have to be negotiated anew. When an employee asked, "Well, why do they want to give us the minimum wage?" Lizardi responded, "Well, it's up to the negotiators, you know, to determine whether they would accept that or not, but after a long negotiation, necessarily they can offer you whatever they think they can afford, whether that's included or not."

Five witnesses for the General Counsel, three of whom had been discharged by Respondent between August 31 and October 5 and all of whom were no longer employed by Respondent, testified that Lizardi made more specific and forceful arguments on behalf of the IBEW:

(1) Santiago (Chago) Cabrera began working for Respondent in 1970 and was discharged on August 31. Lizardi was Cabrera's supervisor in the shipping department. During the months of June, July, and August Cabrera, a strong and vocal supporter of the IRWA, spoke to Lizardi about the unions two or three times a day.

Cabrera testified that in mid-August Lizardi called Cabrera into Lizardi's office and told Cabrera that if he kept quiet and kept calm and helped to calm down the other employees Lizardi would get Cabrera more money and more benefits. On this and other occasions Lizardi asked Cabrera if he belonged to the new (IRWA) or old (IBEW) union. Cabrera replied that he was 100 percent for the new union. Lizardi also said that if the IRWA won the election the employees would go back to making $2.90 per hour. Cabrera told Lizardi that Cabrera would continue talking for the IRWA. Following his conversation with Lizardi, Cabrera told other employees that Lizardi had offered Cabrera money to keep quiet and calm the other employees down. Cabrera told the employees he was 100 percent for the IRWA.

Cabrera testified that in other conversations with Lizardi during this period, at times when they were alone and at times in the presence of other employees, Lizardi said that if the IRWA came into the plant the Respondent would pay the employees $2.90 per hour, and that they would lay off half the employees and maybe even lay off half the supervisors.

Cabrera also testified that he and Lizardi had lunch on one occasion, that they were late returning to work, and that Lizardi took care of Cabrera's card for punching in purposes. During the luncheon Lizardi told Cabrera that if the employees continued to try to put in a new union the same thing would happen at Halo that happened in other companies where the employees put in a new union, it ended with employees laid off and salaries reduced.

Cabrera testified further that every time Lizardi talked about the Union Lizardi would say if the employees did not vote for the IBEW Respondent could move the Company to California or any place because McGraw Edison was a big company and had a lot of money.

Cabrera testified, with respect to the IBEW label, that Lizardi would start his conversations with the statement that if the IRWA came in the Company would lose the use of the IBEW seal, and that they would have to lay off half the employees, lay off some of the supervisors, and reduce the salaries to $2.90.

(2) William Velasquez, employed by Respondent in the shipping department in 1974, was discharged on September 12. He testified that he and about 20 other employees met with Lizardi during working time on or about July 30. Lizardi told the employees that they should vote for the old union (IBEW) and he would take care of everything for them; he would go to personnel and try to get the employees a raise of 25 cents per hour.

Velasquez testified that during the period from July to August he spoke to Lizardi on two other occasions, once in the company of other employees and once alone. In these conversations Lizardi spoke of a strike at an airplane factory where another union entered and the employees lost a lot of money. Lizardi said that the same thing would happen at Halo if another union came in—a lot of jobs would be lost. Lazardi spoke of the IBEW labels, that without the labels the electricians would not install the Company's products and the employees would lose jobs if the IRWA came into the Company. Lazardi also said that the employees' salaries would be lower.

(3) Dionisio Perez, employed by Respondent in February 1976, in the shipping department, was discharged on October 5. He testified that Lizardi spoke to Perez and other employees before working time every day for about an hour during the period from July to August. Lizardi told Perez that if the employees did not vote for the IBEW there would be loss of work, loss of production; the employees would lose benefits; they would have to start with a new contract and minimum wages.

Perez testified that Lizardi compared the employees working at Zenith represented by the IRWA with those represented by the IBEW and said that the former earned less than the latter, Lizardi said that if the employees voted for the IBEW they could get a good contract; if they did not vote for the IBEW the plant could move to another location.

Perez testified further that Lizardi told the employees who gathered around him that he could talk to Thomson to set up a meeting with them and whatever they needed, if they needed an increase, they could talk to Thomson.

Perez also testified that a few days before the election Lizardi said that if the IBEW lost the election the Company would not have the label and, as a result, there would be a loss of production and a lot of layoffs.

(4) Pedro Fortis, who was employed by Respondent as an order filler in the shipping department from August 29, 1978, to November 28, testified that he had four or five conversations with Lizardi during the period from June to August.

Fortis testified that in his first conversation with Lizardi in June the latter said that if the IBEW lost there would be a lot of people who would be laid off and the Company would move the factory to another place.

Fortis also testified that Lizardi said that if the employees supported the IBEW and the IBEW won the election Lizardi would take the employees out to eat and they could drink what they wanted. If the IRWA won the election the Company would pay the employees $2.90 per hour instead of the $5.17 an hour the employees were making and the employees would not have any kind of benefits.

Fortis testified further that all of his conversations with Lizardi, including a conversation a week before the election, were almost to the same effect.

In one of the above conversations Lizardi said that if he could legally find out who voted in favor of the old union (IBEW) he would try to get the employees a 25-cent-per-hour increase.

During some of the conversations employees would ask Lizardi why the label was so important. Lizardi explained that if the IBEW lost the election the Company would not be able to use its label and therefore it would lay off employees and move the factory.

(5) Francisco Lopez was employed by Respondent in the shipping department as an order filler under the supervision of Angel Santiago from August 29, 1978, to August 24, 1979.

Lopez testified that he and six or seven other employees met with Lizardi in the shipping section of the Lite Trend area in mid-August. Lizardi was carrying some handbills and asked the employees if they had received them. Lopez asked what Lizardi thought was the best thing for the employees to do. Lizardi said, "Stay with the one you have, because voting for a new union is like throwing your salaries away and no benefits." Lopez asked Lizardi what he meant. Lizardi said, "If the IRWA wins we will have to negotiate, start from the bottom on the federal rates and then we would have to start from new benefits."

Lopez testified further that in early August he and two other employees were in the cafeteria during their breaktime. Lizardi approached them and said, "You look like smart guys. You speak English, write English and understand English. You could have a better job if you stick with us." Lopez said nothing.

In resolving credibility as to these witnesses I have taken into consideration the probability that the witnesses for the General Counsel may have misunderstood or misinterpreted much of what Lizardi read to them from technical books or told them about negotiation from "Day One" or the need for the IBEW label to sell Respondent's products. It is understandable that some of them would get dizzy listening to him or react angrily by calling him a liar. As Lizardi conceded, the employees with whom he was dealing were highly emotional, impatient people. They were poorly or not at all educated in a formal sense. Certainly, at some point Lizardi, himself highly articulate and knowledgeable, must have realized that he could not accomplish his objective of persuading them to vote for the IBEW by showing them technical treatises and talking about good-faith collective bargaining. It may well be that Lizardi did not make all of the statements in haec verba attributed to him by the General Counsel's witnesses, several of whom were not impressive.[4] But I cannot believe he made none of them. Lizardi's own testimony as to what he told them is too bland (except for metaphors), too pat, and too general to be convincing. It has none of the sharp sting and directness that might be expected from an outspoken, direct, and passionate individual, such as Lizardi. It was, after all, his assigned job to persuade these simple, but very stubborn employees that they had no real choice but to vote for the IBEW. The hard points of impact and persuasion found in Respondent's written material are mirrored in some of the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses, but with added force. In the absence of a more specific and believable version of what Lizardi, in fact, may have told the employees in his vigorous and persistent compaign to insure victory for the IBEW, I credit the testimony of witnesses for the General Counsel over Lizardi.

b. By Supervisor Vince Monaco

Luz Velasquez, who was employed by Respondent from September 26, 1975, to August 20, 1979, testified that on a day in July she was translating into Spanish for a fellow employee a campaign letter about the IBEW label. Monaco interrupted her conversation and said, "I don't want to brainwash you, but this is what the paper says, we could lose our job." Monaco explained that the IBEW journeymen electricians would not install a part that did not have their union label on it; that the Company would not be able to sell the fixtures; that the employees could lose their jobs; and that he might lose his job too.

While Velasquez' testimony was somewhat inconsistent, including statements made in her affidavit, I am satisfied that the above testimony accurately reflects her conversation with Monaco and it is credited. Monaco did not testify.

c. By Supervisor Daniel Hueuink

Dionisio Perez, whose testimony is discussed above, also testified that in late July or early August he and other employees had a conversation with Hueuink, then a division of employee relations manager, in the shipping department. Perez asked Hueuink why they should keep the IBEW label; if the IRWA won the election they could use the label of that Union. Hueuink responded that he did not want that to happen because if the IBEW lost the election the electricians would not want to install the lamps; if that happened there would be layoffs, they would lose benefits, and they would get a new contract at a minimum salary. On cross-examination Perez denied that Hueuink had said anything about company sales if the lighting fixtures were not installed or that there was a discussion of contracts. However, Perez conceded that Hueink said the Company would sit down and negotiate a new contract if the IRWA won the election, but that they had to start with new benefits.

Hueuink testified that on the above occasion, at Lizardi's request, Hueuink spoke to the employees about the IBEW label. Hueuink told the employees that without the IBEW label the IBEW electricians on the construction site would probably not install the fixtures and thus the Company could have a loss of sales. Hueuink indicated that a reduction in sales could reduce employment. Hueuink also told the employees that if the IRWA won the election wages and benefits would have to be negotiated.

Hueuink testified in a clear and straightforward manner. I credit him over Perez as to this conversation.

d. By Supervisor Castor Colon

Pedro Fortis, whose testimony is discussed above, also testified that he spoke to Colon, a supervisor in the shipping department, about the Union three or four times in August. Colon said if the IRWA won the election there was a good probability that many of the employees would lose their jobs and there was a possibility that the factory would move to another location. On several occasions during this period Colon would give the employees a company letter saying, "Here is a paper from the Company" and explain to those who did not understand English what it said.

William Velasquez, whose testimony is discussed above, also testified that he spoke to Colon on one occasion in early August in the presence of other employees. Colon said that the labels could not be changed; that if they changed, the electricians would not be able to install the lamps in any part of the State; that if the IRWA won the election many of the employees would lose their jobs; that salaries would be lowered and there would be a lot of layoffs; the Company would be obliged to move the plant to another location.

While Colon conceded that he had distributed company literature to the employees and that he spoke to Velasquez twice a week during the period prior to the election about softball, Colon denied that he ever discussed the Union or that he had made the statements attributed to him.

Velasquez' affidavit to the Board does not mention his conversation with Colon and at the hearing Velasquez' testimony as to whether he had discussed his testimony with the General Counsel in preparation for the hearing was evasive and contradictory.

Colon, however, was a most unimpressive witness. I cannot believe in this hotly contested campaign that he never discussed the desirability of voting for the IBEW rather than the IRWA with employees under his immediate supervision and with whom he was in daily contact. Velasquez' testimony corroborates that of Fortis. I credit Velasquez and Fortis over Colon.

e. By Traffic Manager Charles Orabutt

Pedro Fortis also testified that on several occasions 2 or 3 weeks before the election Orabutt told Fortis and other employees that if the IRWA won the election the majority of the employees would be laid off and would lose their jobs and the label was very important for the Company to be able to sell the lamps. Orabutt spoke in English, which was translated for Fortis into Spanish. However, Fortis, who has a limited ability to understand English, testified that he was able to understand what Orabutt said in English.

Orabutt testified that in mid-August he was asked by Frank Lopez in the presence of Fortis and other employees why the Company's products could not use the IRWA label instead of the IBEW label. Orabutt told the employees that the IRWA label was not the type of label that could be recognized in the electrical industry; if the IBEW label were not on the product it could be a problem if the electricians did not install it; the loss of the IBEW label would mean a loss of sales for the Company; it would mean the loss of jobs because of the loss of business; there would be layoffs throughout the Company.

I find no serious questions of credibility in the testimony of these two witnesses. Fortis' knowledge of English is quite limited and he may well have understood Orabutt to have made the statements attributed to him. However, I am satisfied that Orabutt's version of what he, in fact, told the employees on the above occasion is more accurate and I credit Orabutt to the extent his testimony varies from that of Fortis.

f. By Supervisor Gomer Baez

Jesus Gonazlez, who was employed as a setup man from October 3, 1977, to September 1979, testified that on or about August 22 he overheard a conversation between Baez and an employee, whom Gonzalez, himself a native of Puerto Rico, believed to be of Mexican origin. Baez told the employee that if the IRWA won the election the Company would call the Immigration Service and a lot of people who were here without legal right would get into trouble. Gonzalez stepped back and said, "Gomer, what are you saying?" Baez replied in Spanish, "You better keep going, you are hot."

Angela Sanchez, who was employed by Respondent for 3 years prior to and at the time of the election, submitted a pretrial affidavit to the General Counsel. Sanchez was not employed at the time of the hearing and her address was unknown. The General Counsel sought to subpena Sanchez at her last known address. The subpena was returned unclaimed. In these circumstances her affidavit was offered and received in evidence.

Sanchez stated in her affidavit that 2 or 3 weeks before the election Baez told Sanchez that Baez knew she was for the new Union and that she was running the risk of being fired. Baez said if the IBEW won Sanchez would be fired and that she was the first one on the list. Baez also said that he would see Sanchez in line waiting for compensation with a cup of coffee and a doughnut in her hand. A day before the election Sanchez reported to Foreman Ivan Saez what Baez had said about Sanchez risking her job. Saez said that Baez had no authority to say that to her. Saez did not testify.

Sanchez stated further that about 2 or 3 weeks before the election Baez and Saez came to the production line and stopped work to talk to about 15 employees. Baez said that if the new Union (IRWA) won the Company would lose the old Union's (IBEW) label and electricians would not install Halo lamps; the Company's merchandise would not get out because when the electricians saw the merchandise did not have the label they would send it back and the employees would be laid off. Saez said that the label was very important and that losing the label would mean losing the merchandise.

Baez denied making the statements attributed to him by Gonzalez and denied telling Sanchez she was running the risk of being fired or that he would see her in line waiting for compensation. Baez testified that he handed out literature to the employees once or twice a day and sometimes more during the preelection period. He talked to the employees about the label and other kinds of problems, but denied ever saying that the employees would be better off with the old union.

Baez was in daily contact with the employees in handing out literature and answering questions. His testimony as to what he actually told the employees is vague and his contention that he never said that the employees would be better off with the old Union (IBEW) is, at least, evasive. Gonzalez' testimony of a veiled threat of discharge is consistent with Sanchez' testimony of an actual threat of discharge. I credit Gonzalez and Sanchez over Baez.

g. By Director of Distribution Joe Jeffress

Santiago Cabrera, whose testimony is discussed above, testified that during the last 2 weeks in July he was called to a meeting in Jeffress' office along with Zoilo Rodriguez and Francisco Lopez. Jeffress spoke in English. Cabrera's ability to understand English is limited. At the hearing most of his testimony was given through an interpreter. Cabrera testified that he understood some of what Jeffress said and Lopez translated other portions. According to Cabrera, Jeffress asked the employees if more money or more benefits were the main thing the employees wanted. Cabrera said, "Yes, it is, more money, more benefits, more something, you know." Jeffress said he would try; he would go to Thomson and maybe Thomson could find something for everybody. Jeffress said the Company could move to some place and lay off the foremen. If the new Union won the election the Company would lay off half the people, maybe 200 to 300 people and the foremen too. On several other occasions Jeffress told Cabrera the employees would lose a lot of benefits if the new Union came in; the new Union was small and could not support a company the size of Halo.

Lopez testified that he recalled the meeting in Jeffress' office with Cabrera and Rodriquez, but did not recall what was said. Rodriguez did not testify.

Jeffress testified that he was informed by Lizardi that several employees wanted to talk to Jeffress privately about working conditions. Jeffress met with the above employees in his office about a month or a month and a half before the election. Lopez told Jeffress that the employees thought things were getting out of hand and all that the employees wanted was to correct some working conditions. Jeffress told the employees he could not make any promises and could not discuss the matter, but asked what some of the working conditions were. The employees said they wanted to talk to Thomson. Jeffress asked for the names of people who were concerned and what they wanted to talk about and he would see what could be done. Jeffress denied making the statements attributed to him by Cabrera. Thereafter, Lizardi gave Jeffress a list of names of employees. Jeffress gave the list to his boss, Greg Hege, vice president of operations. Subsequently, Hege told Jeffress that they could not have a meeting with the employees because they would be violating the law. Jeffress communicated this information to Lopez.

Jeffress also testified that he had a lengthy meeting with Lopez during this period and showed Lopez the IBEW label on a housing item. Jeffress pointed out to Lopez that a tradesman would not install the product if it did not have the label and that meant the Company would not sell its product. About this time Jeffress also had a discussion with Lopez about contract negotiations. Jeffress told Lopez that if the IRWA won the election they would have to start from the first page and the first letter; that with the IBEW the employees had a contract that had been developed over 20 years.

Jeffress testified in a frank and open manner, freely admitting he had discussed with Lopez the IBEW label and the advantage to the employees in contract negotiations if they voted for the IBEW rather than the IRWA. Lopez, on the other hand, had nothing to say about his conversations with Jeffress even though Lopez had translated a portion of Jeffress' remarks to Cabrera at the meeting in Jeffress' office. Nor was Lopez called on rebuttal to contradict Jeffress' testimony that Lopez was told by Jeffress that a meeting with Thomson could not be arranged because it would be unlawful. Cabrera's knowledge of English is poor and it may well be he misunderstood or misinterpreted Jeffress' remarks. In any event, in view of Jeffress' believable testimony and the failure of Lopez to confirm Cabrera's testimony or to contradict the testimony of Jeffress, I credit Jeffress over Cabrera as to the above conversation in Jeffress' office.

h. By President Dan T. Thomson

Concepcion Ocampo, who had been employed by Respondent for 6 years at the time of the hearing, testified that on a day in the early part of August she and about 20 other employees met with Thomson at the production line. Ocampo told Thomson the employees were confused by all the papers that had been passed out to them about the label and asked him to explain the situation to them. Thomson said the label used by the Company was recognized by the Electrical Workers Union and if the product did not bear that label they would refuse to install it. The employees asked why that was so since there were many other factories that were making lamps and did not use the label and still had sales. Thomson said there was no way that they could prove that and because of the label Halo was No. 1 in selling lamps. Thomson distinguished the situation where a lamp was sold in a store from the installation of a lamp at a construction site. Thomson said the electricians belonged to the same union and in refusing to install the products Halo would have less orders, less sales, and less work.

Ocampo also testified that prior to the election Thomson made a speech to the employees in the cafeteria; that he spoke about the label; that he read from a piece of paper; and that he said almost the same thing he had said to the employees on the production line in the above meeting.

Jesus Gonzalez: As indicated above, Gonzalez, despite his position as chief steward for the IBEW, was an original and consistent advocate of the IRWA. Gonzalez testified that Hueuink arranged a meeting between Gonzalez and Thomson on June 18 in Thomson's office. Thomson asked Gonzalez if Gonzalez knew what he was doing in bringing the new Union into the plant. Gonzalez said that he had not brought the Union in, but it could happen. Thomson told Gonzalez that if the Company lost the IBEW it would lose the label and that meant at least one-third of the employees would be laid off. Thomson asked Gonzalez to support the IBEW, to make the right decision. As Gonzalez was leaving, Thomson said, "Don't answer me today; answer me Monday." Gonzalez said, "O.K. I want an appointment with you Monday and I'll answer you Monday." In Gonzalez' meeting with Thomson on June 25 Thomson made substantially the same statements with respect to the loss of the label, the resultant loss of business, and the loss of jobs that Thomson stated in his speech to the employees a few days before the election. The conversation of June 18 was somewhat different in that Thomson repeated in a positive way that there would be a loss of jobs if the Company lost the right to use the IBEW label.

Thomson confirmed Gonzalez' direct testimony that they met on two occasions. Thomson, however, placed the first meeting on June 25 and the second between June 25 and July 6. According to Thomson, the meeting was suggested by Vice President of Manufacturing Bob Rieger and arranged through Gonzalez' line foreman. The meeting was initiated as a result of a request by Gonzalez that he be allowed more time during work to fulfill his responsibilities as shop steward. Thomson testified that the first meeting with Gonzalez was concerned only with this issue and that Gonzalez was granted half an hour in the morning and a half hour in the afternoon to attend to his stewardship duties. Thomson denied that there was any discussion of the IBEW label at this meeting. Thomson testified that the second meeting with Gonzalez occurred at Thomson's request and was due to Gonzalez' failure to adhere to the time limitation. During this meeting Gonzalez asked Thomson if what Gonzalez had been hearing about the IBEW label was actually the fact. Thomson did not recall how he responded, but thought he probably used the Truman Library situation as an example of the problem the Company would face without the IBEW label.

The record shows that Thomson drafted and distributed to subordinates a memo, dated June 26, referring to a meeting with Gonzalez on June 25 and authorizing a half hour in the morning and a half hour in the afternoon to permit Gonzalez to discuss employee problems relating to the interpretation of the contract.

The original notice of representation hearing issued on June 15 for a hearing on June 25, thereafter rescheduled to July 5, at which time the stipulation for an election was entered into.

On rebuttal Gonzalez testified that it was during a third meeting with Thomson that the question of additional time to perform his duties was discussed.

Although there is a great disparity between the economic and social positions of Gonzalez and Thomson, both men are men of high caliber. Both had much to lose or gain in the outcome of this proceeding and both testified with a certain wariness and, I am satisfied, without complete candor. On the one hand, Thomson was aware that Gonzalez was spearheading the drive for the IRWA. As the General Counsel points out, Thomson had never previously met with Gonzalez in a private interview. The issue of granting Gonzalez extra time to attend to his stewardship duties could easily have been arranged without the personal attention of the president of the Company. Moreover, the timing of Thomson's meeting with Gonzalez was at the outset of the IRWA's campaign, a few days before a scheduled Board hearing. On the other hand, Gonzalez did not mention during his direct and cross-examination that he and Thomson had discussed extra time for Gonzalez to attend to his stewardship duties. Only on rebuttal, following the introduction of the memo dated June 26, did Gonzalez concede that he and Thomson had discussed this topic. Gonzalez testified for the first time that there had been a third meeting, although he had previously testified that he had met with Thomson twice, on June 18 and 25.

The testimony of neither of the above witnesses can be credited in its entirety. I find that the two men met only on June 18 and June 25 and that the ostensible purpose of the meetings was the issue of time off for Gonzalez to attend to stewardship duties. I find Further that the issue of the IBEW label was discussed at both meetings and that Gonzalez' version of what Thomson said is believable and substantially accurate, except that I do not credit Gonzalez to the extent he testified that Thomson said that one-third of the employees would be laid off if the Company lost the IBEW label. Such a specific prediction would be inconsistent with all other written and oral statements by Thomson on this subject to employees generally and to Ocampo in particular.

2. Surveillance of union activity

As indicated above, IRWA organizational activity began on June 5. On that date James Weil, union director of the IRWA, Rick Bugajsky, Frank Woljak, and Tony Meccia, other IRWA representatives, arrived at the Halo parking lot at or about 6 a.m. Shortly thereafter Hueuink, Schrader, and several other supervisors arrived. Hueuink accosted the IRWA organizers and ordered them off the property. Thereafter, Weil and his coworkers passed out authorization cards on the easement of the driveway leading to the company parking lot. Schrader and other company supervisors were also on the parking lot between 6 and 7 a.m. on June 6, 7, and 8. Beginning on June 5 IBEW stewards Gonzalez, Ivan Cruz, Carmel Galarza, Ronald Loyo, and Tony Bea were engaged in soliciting employees to sign authorization cards for the IRWA. The supervisors noted this activity and overheard some of the conversations.

Hueuink and Schrader had received information on June 4 that there might be violence on June 5 in connection with the IRWA's organizational campaign. Schrader notified the police department on June 4 that the Company anticipated some difficulty on June 5 and requested their assistance. Between June 5 and 8 an estimated 100 to 500 employees milled about the parking lot in the early morning hours. There was considerable commotion, yelling, and screaming. On June 6 two employees, Frank Lopez and Pedro Reyes, engaged in some form of altercation, which was resolved by a police officer. Schrader made a note of this incident, but otherwise took no notes and did not record the names of employees signing or refusing to sign cards.[5]

3. Cancellation of Company's picnic

On May 2 Respondent issued a circular, announcing that the second annual Halo fiesta day would be held on

[5] On June 5 Gonzalez, Bea, and Galarza were suspended. Gonzalez filed an unfair labor practice charge with respect to these suspensions. The parties stipulated that the charge was dismissed by the Regional Director on the ground that any possible violation of the Act had been remedied. In these circumstances, contrary to the General Counsel, no inference can be drawn from these suspensions that Respondent's conduct served to highlight the danger to employees of passing out IRWA literature on company property. Employees do not have an absolute right to distribute literature at all times and in all places on company property. The Regional Director was satisfied to dismiss the charge without resolving the legality of Respondent's conduct. The General Counsel cannot have it both ways. So far as this case is concerned, the employees' reaction to the above suspensions is immaterial and irrelevant.

Saturday, July 7, for all internal personnel. The picnic, scheduled to last from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m., provided for various forms of entertainment, including swimming, tennis, softball, children's games, dancing, refreshments, and prizes. For the next several months additional bulletins were issued in English and Spanish requesting employees to sign up for the picnic and the various games. Respondent had purchased prizes to be distributed to the employees and their families. It was anticipated that about 700 employees would attend the picnic.

During the last week of June Hueuink began receiving reports of possible problems, including violence, that might occur at the picnic. Pedro Reyes, a member of the organizing committee, told Hueuink that Reyes had been questioned by employees about the use of knives and guns at the picnic; that he had heard that the IRWA advocates were going to attend and show everybody who was boss. Unfer, a nurse, warned Hueuink that there might be violence at the picnic, suggesting that the IRWA in-plant organizers Cabrera, Rodriguez, Gonzales, and Pedro Sanchez planned to attend and cause "trouble."

By memo dated July 5 Respondent canceled the picnic. Thomson explained the reason for the cancellation as follows:

> Information has come to our attention that the organizers for the Independent Radionic Workers of America (IRWA), the independent union that is attempting to become the bargaining agent for our plant production employees, although not invited to our picnic, have made known their intentions to appear there. Recent incidents related to their organizational activities have created increased tensions and aroused feelings among our employees. We believe the picnic would be used by them as a forum to pursue further organizational activities, and if that happens, it would only interfere with the purpose of our picnic. Since adequate security to deal with such a condition is not available, we believe it is in everyone's best interest to avoid such an incident; and, as a precaution, we are cancelling the picnic.

Weil testified that at an IRWA meeting on June 20 the officials of that union decided that IRWA organizers would not attend the picnic. During the 2-week period prior to the date of the scheduled picnic Weil informed Respondent's employees in English during the course of his handbilling activities in front of the Halo plant that IRWA organizers would not attend the picnic. Other IRWA representatives also made the same statement. However, the IRWA did not so inform the employees in its handbills or other publications. Nor did officials of Respondent contact the IRWA to determine whether or not IRWA organizers planned to be present at the picnic. The decision of the IRWA with respect to this matter was due, in part, to a concern that there might be a confrontation among competing groups at the picnic.

B. Assistance to IBEW

1. Disparate treatment of IRWA non-employee organizers with respect to campaigning on Respondent's plant premises

Respondent's contract with the IBEW in effect during times material herein provides that representatives of the IBEW "shall have access to the factory premises of the Employer at any time during working hours for the purpose of investigating and adjusting matters covered by or arising under this Agreement." Pursuant to the above provision Cortes and Kingsley requested and were granted permission by Hueuink or Schrader during the preelection period to enter the plant premises either together or individually two or three times a week. As was customary, they met in Respondent's conference room to discuss grievances, complaints, and other union business and to confer with the IBEW stewards, grievants and, if necessary, company officials or supervisors. Usually, grievances were filed verbally and were reduced to writing only if they could not be resolved at the supervisory level. During the period from June 6 to July 17 at least 10 written grievances were filed. Hueuink conceded that Cortes and Kingsley were also granted permission to go into the plant and investigate grievances of employees on the line. Both Hueuink and Schrader testified that they would break up unauthorized meetings between the IBEW representatives and the employees.

Several witnesses for the General Counsel testified that they observed Cortes talking to employees and urging support for the IBEW. Supervisors in the vicinity did not interfere with Cortes' conduct.

The record is clear that Respondent did not permit IRWA nonemployee organizers to distribute campaign material on plant premises or to solicit support for the IRWA.

2. Disparate treatment of IRWA employee organizers with respect to campaigning on Respondent's plant premises

As indicated above, the IRWA campaign was initiated by the IBEW stewards. During the early days of the IRWA's organizing drive most of the IBEW stewards actively solicited IRWA authorization cards from Respondent's employees and passed out IRWA literature on the parking lot and in the Company's cafeteria. Curiously, as the campaign progressed, literature for both the IBEW and the IRWA was distributed by some stewards, apparently without discrimination. In August toward the end of the campaign the stewards' sentiment shifted to the IBEW. However, stewards Gonzalez, Ivan Cruz, Ronald Loyo, and Lydia Santiago continued to pass out material for the IRWA on plant premises without interference by Respondent's officials.[6]

[6] In making this finding I place no reliance on a document dated July 26 and signed by all IBEW stewards repudiating their support for the IRWA and urging support for the IBEW. Kingsley informed the stewards that they could not remain IBEW stewards unless they signed the document. Nevertheless, Gonzalez remained a supporter of the IRWA and Santiago, his close friend, continued her support for the IRWA until a few days before the election.

Literature for both Unions was passed along the assembly lines without interference from Respondent. Baez testified that Santiago passed out IBEW handbills on Baez' assembly line with his permission. According to Baez, his supervisor, Art Kavanaugh, directed that the steward be permitted to pass out any campaign literature that came into the plant without differentiating between the IRWA and the IBEW.

Literature for both Unions was regularly posted on Respondent's bulletin boards except for a single bulletin board that was glass-enclosed and locked.[7] Hueuink and his assistant would tour the plant nightly and remove the literature of both Unions from the bulletin boards. Respondent has about 450 "towveyor" carts that move throughout the plant. During the election campaign signs in English and Spanish appeared in chalk on the carts, advocating that employees vote for the IBEW or the IRWA. Respondent's supervisors would attempt to remove the signs in the evenings.

Buttons for both Unions were worn by the employees without interference from Respondent's officials.

A few days before the election banners were hung from the ceiling advocating, respectively, that employees vote for the IBEW or the IRWA. Hueuink ordered both banners removed.

3. Rejection of the IRWA's request on behalf of IRWA employee organizers

On August 23 Weil, accompanied by IRWA Representatives Frank Woljak, Rick Bugajsky, and Tony Meccia met with Hueuink and Schrader in the latter's office.

The testimony as to what occurred is conflicting.

Weil, corroborated by Bugajsky, testified that they asked Schrader four questions: (1) Whether IRWA nonemployee representatives could pass out literature in the parking lot; (2) whether Halo employees could pass out IRWA literature in the parking lot; (3) whether IRWA nonemployee organizers could pass out IRWA literature in nonworking areas on nonworking time; and (4) whether IRWA employee supporters could pass out IRWA literature in nonworking areas on nonworking time. Schrader replied affirmatively to question (2) and negatively to all other questions.

Hueuink and Schrader denied that they had refused permission for IRWA employee supporters to pass out IRWA literature on nonworking time in nonworking areas.

I credit Hueuink and Schrader. The record is clear that IRWA employee supporters in fact passed out IRWA literature in the parking lot and in the cafeteria during the entire preelection period without interference by Respondent. Certainly, at least since the incident involving the suspensions of Gonzalez and other IRWA supporters, Hueuink and Schrader were well aware of employee rights to distribute campaign literature in nonworking areas on nonworking time. It makes no sense that they would inconsistently grant such permission to IRWA employee supporters with respect to the parking lot, a nonworking area, while denying permission to campaign in other nonworking areas or on nonworking time.

IV. ANALYSIS AND FINAL CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

A. Conduct Violative of Section 8(a)(1)

I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in the following respects:

(1) Supervisor Tony Lizardi's promise of benefit to Santiago Cabrera in mid-August that if Cabrera kept quiet and kept calm and helped to calm down the other employees Lizardi would get Cabrera more money and more benefits in the context of Cabrera's open advocacy of the IRWA and Respondent's opposition to that Union.

(2) Lizardi's threat to Cabrera in mid-August that if the IRWA won the election the employees would go back to making $2.90 per hour.

(3) Lizardi's threat to Cabrera during the preelection period that Respondent would lay off half the employees and maybe even half the supervisors if the IRWA came into the plant.

(4) Lizardi's threat to Cabrera during the preelection period that if the employees continued to try to put in a new union it would end with employees laid off and salaries reduced.

(5) Lizardi's threat to Cabrera during the preelection period that if the employees did not vote for the IBEW Respondent could move the Company to California or any place because McGraw Edison was a big company and had a lot of money.

(6) Lizardi's threat to Cabrera during the preelection period that if Respondent lost the use of the IBEW label the Company would have to lay off half the employees, lay off some of the supervisors, and reduce salaries to $2.90.

(7) Lizardi's promise of benefit to William Velasquez and other employees on or about July 20 to the effect that Lizardi would go to personnel and try to get the employees a raise of 25 cents per hour if they voted for the IBEW.

(8) Lizardi's threat to Velasquez that the employees' salaries would be lower if a new union came into Halo.

(9) Lizardi's threat to Dionisio Perez and other employees during the preelection period that if the employees did not vote for the IBEW the employees would lose benefits and would have to start with minimum wages.

(10) Lizardi's threat to Perez and other employees during the preelection period that the plant could move to another location if the employees did not vote for the IBEW.

(11) Lizardi's solicitation of employee grievances during the preelection period by informing Perez and other employees that Lizardi could set up a meeting with Thomson for them and they could talk to Thomson about whatever they needed, including an increase.

[7] I do not credit the testimony of James Weil that he saw a handbill for the IBEW posted inside the glass-enclosed bulletin board on the day of the election. Having credited Hueuink that he regularly removed literature for both Unions from the bulletin boards, it is most unlikely that he would permit the posting of campaign literature for the IBEW on a bulletin board under the complete control of Respondent on the day of the election.

(12) Lizardi's threat to Pedro Fortis in June that if the IBEW lost the election the Company would move the factory to another place.

(13) Lizardi's promise of benefit to Fortis during the preelection period that if the employees supported the IBEW and the IBEW won the election Lizardi would take the employees out to eat and they could drink what they wanted.

(14) Lizardi's threat to Fortis during the preelection period that if the IRWA won the election the Company would pay the employees $2.90 per hour instead of the $5.17 they were making and the employees would not have any kind of benefits.

(15) Lizardi's promise of benefit to Fortis that if Lizardi could legally find out who voted in favor of the IBEW Lizardi would try to get the employees a 25-cent-per-hour increase.

(16) Lizardi's threat to Fortis during the preelection period that if the IBEW lost the election the Company would not be able to use the label and therefore they would move the factory.

(17) Lizardi's threat to Francisco Lopez and other employees in mid-August to stay with the Union the employees had because voting for a new union was like throwing away salaries and no benefits; that if the IRWA won the election that the Company would have to start from the bottom on the Federal rates and from new benefits.

(18) Lizardi's promise of benefit to Lopez and other employes in early August that they could have a better job if they would "stick with us" in the context of Respondent's active campaign on behalf of the IBEW.

(19) Supervisor Castor Colon's threat to Pedro Fortis in August that if the IRWA won the election there was a possibility that the factory would move to another location.

(20) Colon's threat to William Velasquez and other employees in early August that if the IRWA won the election salaries would be lowered and the Company would be obliged to move the plant to another location.

(21) Supervisor Gomer Baez' threat on or about August 22 to an unidentified employee, overheard by Jesus Gonzalez, that if the IRWA won the election the Company would call the Immigration Service and a lot of people who had no legal rights would get into trouble.

(22) Baez' threat to Gonzalez on the same occasion, when Gonzalez objected to Baez' comment, that Gonzalez had better keep going, that he was "hot," thereby implying that Gonzalez was risking discharge or other adverse action by Respondent because of Gonzalez' concern on behalf of the employee and the IRWA.

(23) Baez' threat to Angela Sanchez 2 or 3 weeks before the election that Baez knew Sanchez was for the new Union (IRWA) and she was running the risk of being fired; that if the IBEW won the election Sanchez would be the first one to be fired.

The unfair labor practices found above are unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

B. Conduct Not Violative of Section 8(a)(1)

I find that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) in the following respects:

(1) President Thomson's prediction to employee Concepcion Ocampo and other employees in the early part of August that the label used by the Company was recognized by the Electrical Workers Union and if the product did not bear that label they would refuse to install it and in refusing to install the products Halo would have less orders, less sales, and less work; President Thomson's similar statements to Jesus Gonzalez in their meetings on June 18 and 25.[8]

I have given long and serious consideration to the above issue, recognizing, as I do, the enormous advantage to the IBEW and the serious detriment to the IRWA if Respondent may lawfully inform its employees immediately prior to a Board election that a vote for the IRWA rather than the IBEW is, in effect, a vote to lose jobs, possibly their own. But the question presented to me in this case is not the impact on the employees of Respondent's repeated warnings that the loss of the IBEW label would have an adverse effect on the Company and its employees. The legality of an employer's preelection statements rests rather on the truth or falsity of such statements and the power of the employer to influence or affect the consequences it predicts. The Supreme Court has held that an employer is free to communicate to its employees his views about unionism and particular unions. He may predict the precise effect unionism will have on its company provided its prediction is based on objective fact "as to demonstrably probable consequences beyond his control." N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc., 395 U.S. 575, 618 (1969). The prediction falls into the category of an unlawful threat if there is any suggestion or implication that the Employer "may or may not take action solely on his own initiative for reasons unrelated to economic necessities and known only to him." Ibid.

[8] Falling into the same category of statements not violative of Sec. 8(a)(1) are statements made by Lizardi to Velasquez and Perez and admittedly made by Lizardi to employees generally during the preelection period when he explained to them the importance of the IBEW label in selling the Company's products and retaining jobs for the employees. Also included is the explanation of Supervisor Vince Monaco to Luz Velasquez in July of a handbill relating to the importance of the IBEW label to the Company and its employees; the prediction of Supervisor Daniel Hueuink to Dionisio Perez and other employees in late July or early August with respect to the loss of the IBEW label, the loss in sales and the loss in employment; the prediction of Traffic Manager Charles Orabutt in mid-August made to Lopez, Fortis, and other employees that if the IBEW label were not on the product it could be a problem if the electricians did not install it, that the loss of the IBEW label would mean a loss of sales for the Company, a loss of jobs because of the loss of business, and there would be layoffs throughout the Company; Supervisors Baez' and Saez' prediction to Angela Sanchez about 2 or 3 weeks before the election that electricians would not install the Company's products if they did not bear the IBEW label with a result that the merchandise would be sent back and employees would be laid off; Director of Distribution Joe Jeffress' explanation to Lopez during the preelection period that the tradesmen would not install the Company's products if they did not have the IBEW label.

Not included, however, as found above, are statements that the loss of the IBEW label would result in half the employees or half the supervisors being laid off. While the loss of business and the loss of jobs, for reasons stated below, was a probable consequence beyond the Employer's control resulting from the loss of the IBEW label, the record will not support such a finding with respect to a specific number of jobs.

In the instant case Respondent introduced substantial evidence in support of its position that the right to stamp its products with the IBEW label was an important, if not the most important, factor in the rise of Halo from a small three-man facility to the largest manufacturer in the world of incandescent recessed lighting.

Thomson testified that the Company's first major sale of incandescent lighting fixtures was made in 1956 for the Truman Library in Independence, Missouri. On that occasion the electricans on the jobsite were unwilling to install the lamps because they did not bear the IBEW label. As a result of that experience, the Company sought out the IBEW, the employees of the Company became members of that Union, and a contractual relationship between the IBEW and Respondent has continued from that time until August 31.

Respondent's major competitors all have the use of the IBEW label. These include: Lightolier in Jersey City, New Jersey; Progress Lighting in Philadephia, Pennsylvania; Gotham in the vicinity of Cleveland, Ohio; Omega in Long Island, New York; and Thomas Industries in Kentucky.

Ninety percent of Respondent's sales of lighting fixtures are made in the United States. Ninety-five percent of Respondent's products are sold to distributors or contractors for use in large commercial construction projects such as auditoriums, commercial offices, and shopping centers.

On occasion when Respondent's products were sent to the field without the IBEW label, company officials were reminded that the label was missing. On those occasions Respondent was required either to send IBEW labels to the field for those products or to confirm that Respondent was still affiliated with the IBEW.

Patrick Quinn, eastern regional sales manager for Respondent, testified that in sales presentations he would let the customer know at the outset that the Company was an IBEW Company. During his prior experience as a journeyman electrician on a construction site it was Quinn's custom and that of other electricians to check to see that the electrical product bore the IBEW label, commonly referred to as the "bug." During Quinn's experience in lighting installations Quinn had never come across a union label on an electrical product other than the IBEW label.

Joseph Duffy, business representative of the IBEW, testified that in his experience as a journeyman electrician on a construction site it was normal for the union steward to check whether the fixtures bore the label of a union affiliated with the AFL–CIO. If the fixtures did not show such a label the steward on the job would call the IBEW office to determine whether the manufacturer was a union company. Once that was established the company would be notified to send their labels to the jobsite to be affixed to the fixtures.[9]

While the General Counsel challenges the conclusions to be drawn from the above testimony, he introduced no evidence to refute the accuracy of such testimony. No witness for the General Counsel testified that journeymen electricians on commercial jobsites would be willing to install electrical fixtures that did not bear the IBEW label. No evidence was introduced to show that a single major competitor of Respondent used a label other than that of the IBEW. In these circumstances the General Counsel's contention that Respondent's expressed concern over the possible loss of the IBEW label amounts to "unfounded speculation" is, to say the least, without merit.

As indicated above, I have reached my conclusion on this issue after serious consideration and on the basis of the evidence presented. Nevertheless, I must say that the General Counsel's bifurcation of the evidence by failing to allege that Respondent's letters and memos to its employees, signed by Thomson himself and Thomson's speech of August 23, specifically referring to the loss of business and the loss of jobs as a result of the loss of the IBEW label are unlawful, has given me pause. Despite the vigor of the General Counsel's argument in his brief, his failure to include in the complaint conduct in written form otherwise alleged to be unlawful in spoken form raises considerable doubt as to his own conviction in this matter.

(2) The conversation of Director of Distribution Joe Jeffress with Santiago Cabrera in the former's office during the last 2 weeks of July, the testimony of Cabrera as to this conversation having been discredited.

(3) Surveillance of union activity: The evidence adduced by the General Counsel is that supervisors of Respondent were present on Respondent's parking lot on June 5, 6, 7, and 8 at times when nonemployee and employee organizers for the IRWA were engaged in soliciting authorization cards from Respondent's employees. No evidence was adduced that Respondent's supervisors noted the names of employees signing cards for the IRWA or that pictures of card signing activity were taken. The evidence is that notes were not taken. Respondent was informed that organizational activity would occur on its parking lot on June 5 and had reason to believe that there was a possibility of violence. In fact, an altercation did occur on one of the above dates requiring the presence of a police officer. Respondent has a right to police anticipated violence on its property and a right to eject nonemployee union organizers from its parking lot. N.L.R.B. v. The Babcock & Wilcox Company, 351 U.S. 105 (1965). In these circumstances the mere presence of Respondent's supervisors on its parking lot on June 5, 6, 7, and 8 did not constitute unlawful surveillance of union activity.

(4) Cancellation of the company picnic: The evidence does not establish that Respondent's purpose in canceling the picnic scheduled for July or its effect was to interfere with, restrain, and coerce its employees unlawfully in the exercise of their Section 7 rights. For 2 months, including the month of June when the IRWA pursued its organizational drive, Respondent made plans for an elaborate picnic to be enjoyed by the entire complement of plant employees and their families. It was only upon information volunteered by employees that the picnic might degenerate into conflict between opposing groups of employees that Respondent made the decision at the last minute to cancel the picnic. Lizardi testified as to the emotional temperament of many of Respondent's employees. Their feelings for and against the IRWA ran deep. There was talk of knives and guns. In this context it was understandable that employees would be reluctant to subject their families or themselves to an uncomfortable and possibly violent confrontation between IRWA and IBEW supporters. Indeed, officials of the IRWA decided on June 20 that they would not attend the picnic because of their own concern that such a confrontation might occur.

[9] Sec. 8(b)(4) of the Act forbids union activity of a secondary nature with respect to the refusal of employees to handle nonunion products. As a union agent, Duffy's testimony was somewhat circumspect in response to questions relating to the practice of IBEW electricians in refusing to install products that did not bear an acceptable union label.

While Respondent's information that IRWA nonemployee organizers planned to attend the picnic may have been inaccurate, I am satisfied that the question was sufficiently muddy and Respondent's concern sufficiently legitimate to rebut the General Counsel's allegation that the cancellation of the picnic violated Section 8(a)(1).

C. Conduct Not Violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (2)

I find that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the Act in the following respects:

(1) Disparate treatment of IRWA nonemployee organizers with respect to campaigning on plant premises: admittedly, IBEW Officials Cortes and Kingsley were permitted to enter plant premises and investigate grievance problems in the plant proper while IRWA officials were denied access to the plant. It is, however, too well established to require citation of cases that an incumbent union with a contractual right may lawfully exercise that right despite the denial of the same right to an outside union with no representative status. During an election campaign where, as here, there are hundreds of employees it is difficult, if not impossible, to guarantee that the incumbent union will adhere strictly to the terms of the contract and refrain from campaigning on its own behalf. The record shows that Hueuink and Schrader made reasonable efforts to restrict the IBEW officials' contact with employees to legitimate investigation of grievances and conferences with stewards. As a practical matter, this is the most that can be expected of an employer caught in this situation. Inevitably, there were occasions, particularly involving Cortes, who spoke Spanish fluently, when employees would raise questions about various pieces of literature and Cortes would respond. In the balance to be struck between lawful and unlawful assistance such incidents do not rise to the level of unlawful conduct on the part of Respondent in the context of affirmative attempts by Respondent's officials to restrict such activities and the absence of evidence of a policy to permit campaigning by the IBEW while denying such permission to the IRWA.

(2) Disparate treatment of IRWA employee organizers with respect to distribution of literature and posting of campaign materials on Respondent's plant premises: The credited testimony is insufficient to warrant the conclusion that Respondent permitted sympathizers for the IBEW to distribute literature in nonwork areas of the plant on nonwork time and to post campaign materials inside Respondent's plant while denying similar rights to sympathizers of the IRWA.

D. Objections to the Conduct of the Election

Included in the IRWA's objections are the following: (1) that the Employer utilized its plant bulletin boards to display IBEW handbills, letters, and other IBEW papers; (2) that the employer and the IBEW representatives met collectively and individually with captive groups of employees in the plant during working hours; and (3) that the Employer distributed letters, pamphlets, and other literature to the employees threatening loss of jobs and other benefits if they were no longer represented by the IBEW.

I find no merit in these objections. For reasons stated above, the allegations of employer favoritism to the IBEW over the IRWA have not been established. Nor does an employer engage in objectionable conduct by meeting with employees for campaign purposes on working time. No evidence was introduced to refute the accuracy of the facts and figures published in Respondent's letters and pamphlets. I have found above that Respondent's oral predictions of a loss of business and loss of jobs as a consequence of the loss of the IBEW label are not violative of Section 8(a)(1). Applying the standard applicable to objections to the conduct of an election, I find such oral and written predictions protected by Section 8(c) and inadequate as a basis for setting the election aside. These objections are dismissed.

Contrary to Respondent, however, the IRWA's objections are broad enough to encompass conduct found above to constitute violations of Section 8(a)(1) and the objections are sustained on the basis of those findings. The IRWA filed its objections "for the reason that on August 29, 1979 and prior thereto, the Employer unduly influenced and coerced employees in the exercise of their rights to a free and independent choice of bargaining representative," including in its objections the above specific objections.

Respondent was on notice at the hearing that the IRWA rested its case on the evidence adduced by the General Counsel with respect to conduct alleged to be unfair labor practices and now, in part, so found. The mere fact that these unfair labor practices were not specifically alleged in the IRWA's timely objections is insufficient to disregard serious objectionable conduct within the critical preelection period that unduly influenced the employees in their choice of a bargaining representative. Decoto Aircraft Inc., 209 NLRB 1034 (1974), 512 F.2d 758 (9th Cir. 1975), cert. denied 423 U.S. 836.

I shall recommend that the election held on August 29 be set aside and that the Regional Director for Region 13 conduct a new election in accordance with the Board's established Rules and Regulations.

The Buckley School and California Federation of Teachers, American Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO. Case 31-CA-11114

December 15, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

Upon a charge filed on May 8, 1981, by California Federation of Teachers, American Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO, herein called the Union, and duly served on The Buckley School, herein called Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 31, issued a complaint on June 9, 1981, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge and complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on the parties to this proceeding.

With respect to the unfair labor practices, the complaint alleges in substance that on February 23, 1981, following a Board election in Case 31-RC-4692, the Union was duly certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the unit found appropriate;[1] and that, commencing on or about March 9, 1981, and at all times thereafter, Respondent has refused, and continues to date to refuse, to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative, although the Union has requested and is requesting it to do so. On June 19, 1981, Respondent filed its answer to the complaint admitting in part, and denying in part, the allegations in the complaint.

On August 27, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment. Subsequently, on September 2, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Respondent thereafter filed a response to the Notice To Show Cause.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

In its answer to the complaint and in response to the Notice To Show Cause, Respondent admits that it refused and continues to refuse to recognize the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees. While it denies that the Union requested bargaining or that it refused to bargain, it does not challenge the authenticity of the Union's March 4, 1981, letter requesting bargaining and its March 9, 1981, letter refusing the request. (Both letters are attached as exhibits to the General Counsel's motion.) In defense of its conduct, Respondent contests the validity of the certification issued by the National Labor Relations Board. Specifically, Respondent asserts that it was improperly denied a hearing on its objections to the conduct of the election in that it had raised substantial and material issues of fact. The General Counsel asserts that Respondent improperly seeks to relitigate issues which were raised and decided in the representation case. We agree with the General Counsel.

A review of the record, including the record in Case 31-RC-4692, reveals that, following a hearing on the Union's petition, the Regional Director issued a Decision and Direction of Election on October 15, 1980. Respondent thereafter filed a timely request for review and supporting brief with the Board. On November 11, 1980, the Board issued an order finding that substantial issues had been raised concerning the managerial status of three individuals which could best be resolved through the challenged ballot procedure, and in all other respects denying Respondent's request for review because it raised no substantial issues warranting review. An election was held on November 13, 1980, in which 33 ballots were cast for, and 30 against, the Union, with 3 challenged ballots. Respondent subsequently filed objections to conduct affecting the results of the election and a statement of position concerning the three challenged ballots. Respondent also requested that a hearing be held for the presentation of evidence and argument. The Regional Director gave both parties reasonable notice and opportunity to present all relevant evidence, and conducted a full investigation of all objections and challenges. Thereafter, on February 23, 1981, the Regional Director issued a Supplemental Decision and Certification of Representative, in which he sustained the challenge to one voter's ballot, and concluded that Respondent's objections failed to raise substantial or material issues which would warrant setting aside the election, thereby by implication also concluding that a hearing was not warranted. Respondent's request for review of the Supplemental Decision and Certification of Representative and request for oral argument was denied by the Board on June 17, 1981.

It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues which were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding.[2]

All issues raised by Respondent in this proceeding were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding, and Respondent does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege that any special circumstances exist herein which would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding. We therefore find that Respondent has not raised any issue which is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent is a California corporation engaged in the operation of a private school with its principal place of business in Sherman Oaks, California. Within the 12 months preceding the Decision and Direction of Election, Respondent derived gross revenues in excess of $1 million. It annually purchases goods and services valued in excess of $5,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

California Federation of Teachers, American Federation of Teachers, AFL–CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Representation Proceeding

1. The unit

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All faculty members employed by the Employer at its location at 3900 Stansbury Avenue, Sherman Oaks, California, excluding office clerical employees, janitorial employees, bus drivers, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

2. The certification

On November 13, 1980, a majority of the employees of Respondent in said unit, in a secret-ballot election conducted under the supervision of the Regional Director for Region 31, designated the Union as their representative for the purpose of collective bargaining with Respondent.

The Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in said unit on February 23, 1981, and the Union continues to be such exclusive representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. The Request To Bargain and Respondent's Refusal

Commencing on or about March 4, 1981, and at all times thereafter, the Union has requested Respondent to bargain collectively with it as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the above-described unit.

Commencing on or about March 9, 1981, and continuing at all times thereafter to date, Respondent has refused, and continues to refuse, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative for collective bargaining of all employees in said unit.

[2] See Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. N.L.R.B., 313 U.S. 146, 162 (1941); Rules and Regulations of the Board, Secs. 102.67(f) and 102.69(c). In its response to the Notice To Show Cause, Respondent also argues, for the first time, that the Regional Director improperly considered and relied upon evidence that Respondent had not seen in the earlier representation case. Respondent's failure to timely raise this issue in the representation proceeding constitutes a waiver precluding it from raising this issue as a defense to its refusal to bargain with the Union. See Fall River Savings Bank, 250 NLRB 935, 936, fn. 12 (1980), enfd. 649 F.2d 50, 57–61 (1st Cir. 1981); St. Anthony Hospital Systems, 252 NLRB 50 (1980), enforcement denied on other grounds 655 F.2d 1028 (10th Cir. 1981).

Further, in the representation case Respondent did not seek review with respect to the Regional Director's sustaining of the challenge to the ballot of Wendy Jane Lawson. The remaining ballots were then not determinative. As to the objections, the facts were either essentially undisputed, or the Regional Director accepted as true the evidence submitted by Respondent, apparently investigating only to ascertain whether the objections were otherwise supported. Finally, Respondent submitted its evidence in support of its objections as exhibits to its request for review, and the Board concluded that they were insufficient to warrant granting review with respect to the Regional Director's determination that the Union should be certified without the holding of a hearing. Rexco D.S., Inc., and/or White Cross Stores, Inc., No. 14 v. N.L.R.B., 653 F.2d 264 (6th Cir. 1981).

Accordingly, we find that Respondent has, since March 9, 1981, and at all times thereafter, refused to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, and that, by such refusal, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and, upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

In order to insure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of certification as beginning on the date Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit. See Mar-Jac Poultry Company, Inc., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Commerce Company d/b/a Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817; Burnett Construction Company, 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Buckley School is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. California Federation of Teachers, American Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All faculty members employed by Respondent at its location at 3900 Stansbury Avenue, Sherman Oaks, California, excluding office clerical employees, janitorial employees, bus drivers, and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since February 23, 1981, the above-named labor organization has been and now is the certified and exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

6. By the aforesaid refusal to bargain, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing, employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Galesburg Construction Company, Inc. and John E. Knowles. Case 14-CA-15145

December 15, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS JENKINS AND ZIMMERMAN

Upon a charge filed on June 24, 1981,[1] by John E. Knowles, and duly served on Galesburg Construction Company, Inc., herein called Respondent, the General Counsel for the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 14, issued a complaint on August 6 against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge and complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on the parties to this proceeding. Respondent did not file a timely answer to the complaint.

On September 14, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board in Washington, D.C., a Motion for Summary Judgment, with appendixes attached. Subsequently, on September 17, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. On the same date, Respondent filed an answer to the complaint. Thereafter, on September 28, the General Counsel filed a motion to strike the answer as untimely filed. On October 5, Respondent filed a response to the Notice To Show Cause.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion To Strike Answer As Untimely Filed and Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, provides as follows:

> The respondent shall, within 10 days from the service of the complaint, file an answer thereto. The respondent shall specifically admit, deny, or explain each of the facts alleged in the complaint, unless the respondent is without knowledge, in which case the respondent shall so state, such statement operating as a denial. All allegations in the complaint, if no answer is filed, or any allegation in the complaint not specifically denied or explained in an answer filed, unless the respondent shall state in the answer that he is without knowledge, shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board, unless good cause to the contrary is shown.

The complaint and notice of hearing issued on August 6, and served on Respondent by registered mail, return receipt dated August 8, specifically states that, unless an answer to the complaint is filed within 10 days from the service therof "all of the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and may be so found by the Board." Further, according to the Motion for Summary Judgment, counsel for the General Counsel informed Respondent by letter dated August 26 that, if Respondent did not file an answer by September 2, summary judgment would be sought. Respondent did not file an answer to the complaint until September 17. The General Counsel thereupon filed a motion to strike the answer as untimely filed.

Respondent's response to the Notice To Show Cause argues that the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Respondent states that on or about July 13 an attorney for the Board, Gail Barder, questioned Respondent's president, Patrick H. Thomas, about the issues involved in this case. Respondent contends that, at the conclusion of the meeting, Thomas asked Barder if there was anything else he would have to do or answer in connection with this case, and Barder replied that there was not. Respondent alleges that Thomas was unavailable during most of August because he was out of his office on business, and that, relying on Barder's representation to him, he did not inform his office staff to advise him of any communication from the National Labor Relations Board. Respondent maintains that Thomas did not learn of the complaint until September 8, and that Thomas then immediately sought to retain counsel.

We do not think that Respondent's submissions constitute good cause, within the meaning of Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations for failure to file a timely answer. Respondent's reliance upon Barder's alleged assertion is wholly misplaced. Assuming arguendo that the alleged representation was in fact made, Respondent, as noted above, had been duly served with the complaint and notice of hearing which clearly stated that Respondent must file an answer, and was also notified by letter dated August 26 that it must file an answer by September.

[1] All dates herein are in 1981.

2. In these circumstances, we find that Respondent had been put on notice that it was required to file an answer.[2] In addition, the fact that Thomas was not in his office for most of August does not relieve Respondent of its obligation to answer the complaint.[3]

Accordingly, we grant the motion to strike the answer as untimely filed. We similarly find that Respondent has offered no valid reason why the Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted, and, under the rule set forth above, the allegations of the complaint are deemed admitted and are found to be true, and we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Galesburg Construction Company, Inc., a Delaware corporation with an office and place of business at 147 South Cherry, Galesburg, Illinois, is engaged as a general contractor in the building and construction industry. Respondent's jobsites at J. C. Penney and Blessing Hospital, Quincy, Illinois, are the only jobsites involved in this proceeding. During the 12-month period ending July 31, Respondent performed services valued in excess of $50,000 for various enterprises located outside the State of Illinois.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

On or about June 18, Respondent told an employee that he was being laid off because he had engaged in union activities. On or about June 19, Respondent told an employee that he would not be hired on Respondent's projects in Quincy, Illinois, because of his union activities. We find that, by such conduct, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Since on or about June 18, and continuing to date, Respondent has refused to hire employee John E. Knowles because he joined, supported, or assisted a union, and engaged in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection. We find that, by such conduct, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section II, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

IV. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent shall offer employee John E. Knowles immediate and full employment in the position for which he applied, or, if that job no longer exists, a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges. Respondent shall also make Knowles whole for any loss of earnings suffered by reason of its unlawful refusal to hire him. Backpay shall be computed in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[4]

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

Conclusions of Law

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On May 11, 1981, Administrative Law Judge James P. Timony issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.[3]

1. Substitute the following paragraph for paragraphs 1(a) and (b):

"(a) Discharging or otherwise discouraging employees for their support of Truckdrivers, Chauffeurs and Helpers, Local Union No. 100, an affiliate of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, or any other labor organization of its employees, by discriminating against them for engaging in protected union activity."

[1] Respondent and the General Counsel have excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

We agree with the Administrative Law Judge's findings that James Morgan was not discharged. In so doing we disavow the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that Morgan was not an employee of Respondent. Morgan was a part-time employee who had worked for Respondent in the past. The established practice was for Morgan, because of a communication problem, to contact Respondent when he needed work. On March 26 Morgan contacted Respondent and was assigned a route.

While fueling his truck at the truck stop, he met the other drivers who were discussing the Swigert incident, and decided to return to the company yard with them to discuss the matter with Respondent's president, King. This meeting lasted several hours and at its conclusion the drivers decided it was too late to begin their routes. When Morgan informed King that he was not going out on his route, King requested the truck keys. Morgan asked if he was going to be fired and King replied, "no." Morgan never contacted King after March 26. For that reason the Administrative Law Judge found that Morgan was not discharged but rather voluntarily discontinued the established employment arrangement. We agree.

[2] We adopt the Administrative Law Judge's finding based on credibility that Respondent by Meade King did not threaten plant closure when he talked to Otis Mefford during the organizational campaign. We therefore find it unnecessary to decide Meade King's status with Respondent.

Under the section entitled "Discussion" the Administrative Law Judge apparently buttressed his finding that Respondent was hostile to the Union with an incident which took place between Combs and driver Jim Hudson. Although we adopt the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Combs discharged Swigert for antiunion purposes, we disavow any inference drawn from the incident in which Combs excluded Hudson from the "shop."

[3] The complaint alleged that Respondent, by Supervisor Combs, violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by assaulting employee Swigert during an unlawful discharge. Although the Administrative Law Judge found that Swigert was assaulted, he failed to make a finding as to whether such conduct violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. The General Counsel excepts to this omission. We find that Combs' assault of Swigert, in the context of and related to his unlawful discharge and because of his union activity, violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act and we shall amend the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order and notice accordingly.

WE WILL NOT assault employees because they engage in union activity.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer John Swigert immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and WE WILL make him whole for any loss of pay he suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against him, plus interest.

KING TRUCKING COMPANY

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES P. TIMONY, Administrative Law Judge: These consolidated cases were heard in Cincinnati, Ohio, on February 19 and 20, 1981, upon the complaint of the General Counsel issued June 26, 1980, based upon the charge filed on May 16, 1980, by James Morgan and the amended consolidated complaint issued July 23, 1980, based upon the charge filed by Ernest Centers on June 17, 1980.

The complaints allege that King Trucking Company unlawfully discharged three employees, John Swigert, James Morgan, and Ernest Centers; coercively interrogated and threatened employee Ernest Centers; promised employees additional benefits if they would forego support of the union; withdrew company credit cards from employees because of their participation in the union organizing campaign; and that Respondent's agent/supervisor, Tom Combs, assaulted an employee because of that employee's support of the union. At the hearing, another allegation added is that Meade King coercively threatened employees with plant closure if the union was selected as the employees' collective-bargaining representative.

Respondent, in the answer, admits jurisdiction but denies the commission of any unfair labor practices. Respondent contends that the three named employees voluntarily quit their jobs and denies that Tom Combs was a supervisor under the law.

Upon consideration of the whole record, and my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

King Trucking Company is a partnership, with an office and place of business in Burlington, Kentucky, engaged in the operation of a trucking service, providing services valued in excess of $50,000. The company admits and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. The parties stipulated that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE EVENTS

King Trucking Company transports coal and sand. Gary King, president of the Company, owns 70 percent of the stock, and his father, Meade King, owns the rest.[1] They own 10 Mack trucks and employ 10 drivers.[2] The Company transports coal exclusively for Madison Coal Company which contracts to buy coal directly from coal mines and then, each morning, directs King where the coal is to be picked up.

Drivers come in about 8 a.m., receive their assignments, go to the sand pits, load, and go to Lexington or London, Kentucky. They unload the sand and go to the coal fields east of Lexington to load coal. They drive to the Madison Coal Company in Cincinnati, dump the coal, and return as late as 10:30 p.m. to the King Trucking Company.

The drivers are paid 25 percent of the gross revenue received by King for each haul of sand and coal. On some days Madison Coal Company has not contracted for enough coal to fill all of the trucks. King then allocates the hauling of coal to the drivers by seniority. On some days the drivers haul only sand and come back empty.

In February 1980, a union[3] started an organizing campaign at the King Trucking Company. The drivers signed union authorization cards, and the union filed a representation petition on February 26, 1980. The parties entered into a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election which was approved by the Regional Director of Region 9 of the National Labor Relations Board on April 18, 1980. The results of the election were five votes for the union; no votes against the union; and six challenged ballots. The Regional Office resolved three of these six challenges, finding that their ballots should not be counted. Since the remaining three challenged ballots would not affect the outcome of the election, the union was certified as the exclusive bargaining representative of the truck drivers on May 27, 1980.

[1] Meade King is not in the management of the Company.

[2] King also leases about 30 trucks from owner-operators and, acting as a broker, leases the trucks to Madison Coal Company.

[3] Truck Drivers, Chauffeurs and Helpers, Local Union No. 100, an affiliate of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America.

A. Tom Combs' Assault

The most dramatic incident in this case involves a fracas between Tom Combs and John Swigert on March 24, 1980.

Tom Combs had leased a truck to King and had worked part-time as a mechanic for the Company for several years. In January 1980, King had just purchased five new Mack trucks, at $75,000 each, and hired Combs as a full-time mechanic. In March 1980, the trucks were breaking down due to the drivers' failure to perform routine maintenance and because the trucks were being driven overloaded over rough roads. Gary King told the drivers that he had authorized Tom Combs to report any further instances of breakdown due to driver negligence, and King said he would discharge the driver. Combs apparently was the only employee in the office after the trucks had gone on their daily journey, and he answered the telephone in the office in Gary King's absence and took messages. He recommended two drivers who were employed by the Company. Gary King admitted on the witness stand that Tom Combs was in charge when he was away. In fact, King told several of the drivers that Combs was "road boss" and that Combs could fire them if they mistreated the equipment.[4]

About 10:30 p.m. on March 24, 1980, the drivers were returning to the yard at King Trucking Company. John Swigert, a driver for King for about 2 years, helped another driver back his truck into the yard. Swigert then approached a group of other drivers, joshing how he was going to have to conduct lessons in driving. At the same time, Tom Combs approached the group to find the root of the hostility recently shown to him by some of the drivers. He asked one of the group, John Keeler, whom Combs had considered to be his friend, why the drivers had not been talking to him. Combs said that if it was related to Gary King giving him the authority to report abused equipment, he assured them that he would confront the driver with the facts before taking him into the office and reporting the matter to King. At that point Swigert joined the group and asserted that Combs would not take him into the office. This lead to an escalation of heated threats. Combs testified that Swigert said that he did not like working for Gary King and that when he left he was going to make sure King was out of business. Combs said that he then called Gary King on the telephone and recommended to King that Swigert be discharged because he felt that Swigert was threatening the livelihood of all of the drivers. Swigert, however, gave a different version of what happened.[5] He testified that the following dialogue occurred:

> I said, "Are you firing me?" I said, "Am I fired." He said, "Yeah, if I say you're fired, you're fired, buddy." I said, "Well, why are you firing me?" And he said, "Well, you and the God damned Union are going to break this trucking company." And I said, "I don't have any more to do with the Union than anybody else around here, Mister." And he said, "Well, you're fired." And I said, "Well, if I'm fired, pay me so I can go on home." He said, "I'll do just that."

Combs then went into the office to call Gary King. He dialed the telephone. He picked up a tire hammer and hit it on a bench while he talked on the phone. After he hung up the telephone he came back toward Swigert and said, "You come in in the morning and get your money. It will be here." Swigert testified that Combs then threw the tire hammer underneath a truck and hit the wall with a terrible "rippet." Arguing resumed and with both screaming imprecations Combs reaffirmed his point of view by jabbing his finger into Swigert's chest. Swigert finally pushed Combs hard with a blow similar to a straight arm in football, mashing Combs' mouth. Swigert left to go to his car. Combs followed him into the dark yard and Swigert testified at the hearing as to what next occurred:

> And I saw a shadow and I threw up my hand and a shovel come across my arm and nearly broke my arm and stuck in my head. And I went down in the rocks and he hit me again, flatways, right about the ear with the shovel. And then he hit me in the back. I was down in the yard bleeding and getting fainty. And I hollered for help and nobody come. And my car was sitting there running with the door open. And I crawled in it. Someway I got up to Burns' Truck Stop and somebody called the Law and the ambulance. The blue lights was everywhere in the—and they took me to the hospital.

Two days later, when word of the altercation had spread, the drivers met at a truck stop for coffee before proceeding to pick up their load. Driver Ernest Centers called Gary King and wanted him to come to the truck stop to talk about it. King declined and said that they would discuss it on the following day. Instead, however, the drivers returned to the company yard. As Centers was getting his equipment out of the truck, Gary King saw a baseball bat in the cab of the truck. He grabbed it and ran to the office to call the police.

B. Promising Benefits To Forego the Union

After the police arrived at the company yard, they advised the drivers to go home. First, however, Gary King invited the drivers into his office individually to discuss the affair. Later, he addressed a group of drivers in the yard again asking about their grievances. They told him that they were afraid of Tom Combs, and that they wanted health insurance and "show-up" pay (a $10 payment to each driver for appearing at the company yard on days when King had nothing to haul). King had received legal advice and told the drivers that, because of the union organizational campaign, he could not make any promises but he implied that the demands were reasonable. He told the drivers that he could not discharge

[4] Ernest Centers' testimony on this point was corroborated by drivers Otis Mefford and Ritchie Smeal, neither of whom is now employed by King and therefore they are without bias. Respondent did not call other employees who were present during this conversation.

[5] I find from my observation of the witnesses that Swigert's testimony as to the reason he was fired is more accurate. Combs appeared to be a combative individual and was not a trustworthy witness. He appeared to be willing to give whatever testimony might help the Company's cause, whereas Swigert appeared to be a relatively sincere witness.

Combs because of the union campaign but that Combs had no power to fire Swigert and that Swigert was not fired. King also said that he would see that Combs would not hit anybody else, and the drivers said that was what they wanted and they left and returned the next day for work.[6]

C. Discharge of Swigert, Centers, and Morgan

The day after the altercation, Gary King tried to find out what had happened. He asked the other three drivers who had been there, but they had not seen much because the yard was dark and they had not heard much of the dialogue between Combs and Swigert. King tried to call Swigert on the telephone, but he got Mrs. Swigert and she said she did not know what had happened. King told driver Jim Hudson, who was Swigert's friend, to see Swigert and tell him he was not fired. Swigert did return to vote in the union election at the request of the union organizer but did not return to work as a driver because he felt that he had been fired and his lawyer told him to stay away from King Trucking Company.

Ernest Centers continued to drive for King for several weeks after the incident involving the baseball bat. Centers received several fines for driving overloaded trucks in early 1980 and claims that King required him to continue to drive overloaded, and that he therefore had to leave the Company.

King had a policy that drivers should not drive the trucks overloaded because it is illegal and can damage the springs and other parts of the truck. Scales are located at the tipple of the coal mine where the trucks are loaded, but, since they are paid on a percentage of the weight of the load carried, some drivers did drive overloaded and King formerly had paid the commission even on loads exceeding the legal limit. After he bought the new trucks, however, King told the drivers that he would pay the commission only up to the legal amount. This policy was posted on the bulletin board in the office.

About May 1, 1980, King's orders to transport coal dropped off drastically.[7] Gary King told Centers that, although there would be no coal to haul for a while, he could haul sand. Centers said that he could not make a living that way. Centers claims that he called Gary King on the night of May 15, 1980, asking for work and that King told him he would have to haul sand overweight and that he refused and that the next day he went and applied for workmen's compensation, stating that he had been discharged for failure to carry more than the legal weight. An unemployment insurance examiner for the State of Kentucky, Stephen Schultz, testified that he asked Gary King whether this was true and that King replied that Centers could come back to work under the same conditions as he worked before. Since I find that King had a policy against driving overweight, this offer meant, in effect, that Centers had not been discharged. Centers later saw driver Jim Hudson at a truck stop and admitted to him, "I'm kind of in a way sorry I quit."[8]

James Morgan was one of three substitute dirivers who had worked for King Trucking when regular drivers were unavailable. Since Morgan did not have a telephone at his home, his practice was to call King when he wanted work. Morgan had worked for King on 2 previous days, on March 14 and 23, and he asked Gary King to work on March 26, 1980, the day of the baseball bat incident. Morgan had not filled out an application and had not been hired as one of King's full-time drivers. When he returned from the truck stop with the other drivers to protest the altercation, he was invited into the office and Gary King asked him why he had returned to the yard. Morgan said he wanted something done about Combs. King told him to turn over the key to the truck. Morgan asked if he was fired and King said, "No." He left the yard and did not return.

D. Coercive Interrogation of Ernest Centers

Ernest Centers testified that at 9 a.m. on March 4, 1980, he was fixing a flat tire in the shop when Gary King came up to him and asked him what he knew about the Union, and Centers replied that if King wanted to know anything about the Union he should get everybody together. Centers alleged that King said that he would find out who started it and fire them and if he could not find out who it was he would fire everybody. Gary King denied making this statement.

Based on their demeanor and their whole testimony I find that Gary King's denial of this allegation is more credible. The evidence shows that King was receiving competent legal advice—which he followed—not to mention the Union to the employees.[9] Further, other drivers testified that King had not interfered with their rights to vote in the Union.

E. Withdrawal of Credit Cards

King Trucking Company provided a credit card kept in each truck so that the driver could use it to pay the tolls on the highway. During the spring of 1980, Gary King noted that his bill for tolls had increased $200 in 1 month and that the receipts showed that unauthorized automobiles and trucks were being checked through the toll booth on the credit cards. He therefore removed the credit cards from the trucks for 2 months and gave the drivers cash for the tolls. There is no evidence that the credit cards were intended as a prequisite, nor that the temporary discontinuance had anything to do with the Union.

F. Meade King's Threat

During the testimony of driver Otis Mefford, he stated that Meade King said that there would not be a union at the Company and that "he would close it down and go back to Tennessee." This statement responded to a leading question, and was unadorned by details as to where and when it occurred as well as any information about any other witnesses who heard the statement.[10] The allegation was not in the complaint and Respondent was not prepared to defend against it and had no duty to probe for further detail. Furthermore, while Meade King is a stockholder in King Trucking Company, there is no record proof that he has any management function, nor that he had the power to close down the Company.

[6] Otis Mefford generally corroborated Gary King's testimony as to what was said on this occasion.

[8] This testimony was technically hearsay elicited through driver Jim Hudson. Ernest Centers was in the courtroom, however, and heard the testimony and later testified on rebuttal and denied the statement. By their demeanor, I believe Hudson to be the more credible witness.

III. CONCLUSIONS

1. Ernest Centers, a claimant in this proceeding, was not coercively interrogated concerning his union sympathies by Gary King, president of Respondent, on March 4, 1981. In addition, Centers was not coercively interrogated by Gary King concerning which employee initiated the union campaign.

2. Respondent, through Gary King, did not on March 4, 1980, threaten to discharge the employee who began the union campaign. Furthermore, Gary King did not threaten to fire all the employees if he could not find the particular employee who began the union campaign.

3. Respondent employed Tom Combs as a full-time mechanic in January 1980. Combs' duties included repairing Respondent's equipment, recommending prospective drivers for employment, reporting to Gary King any abuse of the equipment, discharging employees for such abuse, and answering the phone and being in charge when Gary King was not on Respondent's premises.

4. Tom Combs was a supervisor for King Trucking Company.

5. Respondent discharged its employee, James Swigert, on March 24, 1980, for union activity.

6. Respondent, through Gary King, did not promise additional insurance and showup pay to its employees on March 26, 1980, and did not threaten the employees that the Union would never represent them. On March 26, 1980, Gary King told a group of employees that he could not discuss the Union with them nor offer them additional benefits because of the union election.

7. Respondent did not discharge James Morgan, a claimant herein, but Morgan voluntarily terminated the arrangement he had with Respondent. James Morgan was not a full-time employee with Respondent, but only a "fill-in" who would temporarily drive when another driver could not work. Morgan only drove for Respondent on 3 days, never filled out an employment application, and was not an employee of Respondent.

8. Respondent did not discharge Ernest Centers, but Centers voluntarily terminated his employment with Respondent. When Centers asked Gary King if he could return to his employment, King said he could under the previous conditions but King did not say that Centers had to haul illegal overweight loads of sand and coal as a condition of reemployment.

9. Meade King did not threaten to close down the shop if the employees formed a union.

Discussion

In deciding whether Respondent unlawfully discharged John Swigert, there are three issues: (1) whether Tom Combs was Respondent's supervisor,[11] (2) whether Swigert was discharged or quit, and (3) what was the motivation for the discharge.

The National Labor Relations Act defines the term "supervisor," 29 U.S.C. §152, as follows:

> The term "supervisor" means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

The fact that Combs was authorized to discharge employees, without more, is sufficient to show that he was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act: ". . . [T]he possession of any one of the authorities listed [in that section] places the employee vested with this authority in the supervisory class. Ohio Power Company v. N.L.R.B., 176 F.2d 385, 387 (6th Cir. 1949). Since Tom Combs was authorized to discharge employees, he was a supervisor under the Act.

Furthermore, even Gary King testified, in effect, that Combs was authorized with the power effectively to recommend the discharge of an employee; Combs is, therefore, a supervisor within the meaning of the Section. Elliott-Williams Co. Inc., 143 NLRB 811, 816 (1963), enfd. 345 F.2d 460 (7th Cir. 1965).[12] And, two disinterested witnesses, Otis Mefford and Ritchie Smeal, testified that, after the drivers complained to King about Tom Combs hitting John Swigert with a shovel, King said that, although he could not discharge Combs because of the union campaign, he would see that Combs was no longer a "foreman" or a "boss," thus implying that Combs had in fact been a supervisor when he discharged Swigert.

Tom Combs appears to have an irascible nature. His dominant motive for discharging Swigert, however, was Combs' prejudice against the Union, expressed in his response to Swigert's question why he was being fired. This animus was also indicated by his treatment of Jim Hudson, a leader of the union movement. One night 2 weeks after Swigert was discharged, Hudson was parking his truck in the company lot when the rear end of the truck caught fire. He ran into the shop for a hose to put out the fire and Combs began to curse him, and, pointing his finger at Hudson, told him, "You ain't allowed in the shop." Combs told driver Richie Smeal, "I've got nothing to say to you, Richie. I'm talking to him." Richie Smeal was one of two drivers working for King who did not participate in organizing the Union.

[10] Although Otis Mefford was a trustworthy witness, I am not required to find as a fact everything he said. Edwards Transportation Company, 187 NLRB 3 (1970), enfd. per curium 437 F.2d 502 (5th Cir. 1971).

[11] Since I find that Combs was a supervisor, there is no need to decide whether Combs acted as Respondent's agent.

[12] Respondent's argument that Combs could not be a supervisor because he was allowed to vote in the union election is without merit. N.L.R.B. v. Elliott-Williams Co., Inc., 345 F.2d 460, 463.

When Respondent's employee Tom Combs, acting as a supervisor, told John Swigert that he was discharged,[13] and a motivating factor in that act was Union activity protected by the Act, the burden shifted to Respondent to show that the discharge would have occurred even in the absence of the protected activity. Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). Respondent offered no reason to justify Swigert's discharge.

Respondent, in fact, denies that Swigert was discharged. The point having been emphasized with shovel blows, I believe that Swigert acted reasonably in thinking that he had been discharged[14] and that Respondent had a duty clearly to demonstrate to Swigert that he had not been discharged. Gary King's inconclusive call to Mrs. Swigert to find out what had happened, and his use of Jim Hudson as an emissary, did not, in my opinion, fulfill this obligation. King saw Swigert at the election on April 28, 1980, and could have made clear his intent at that time. He testified that he saw Swigert on his lot at the union election but said nothing. That is not in my estimation a good-faith repudiation of Combs' reprehensible conduct or adequate reassurance that Swigert's job was still available.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent, by Tom Combs, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by unlawfully discharging employee John Swigert as a result of his activity on behalf of the Union.

4. Except as found above, Respondent has not engaged in other unfair labor practies as alleged.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary that it cease and desist therefrom and from any like or related conduct, and to post an appropriate notice, attached hereto as an Appendix.

Moreover, Respondent should make whole employee John Swigert for any loss of pay as a result of the discrimination against him, and offer him immediate and full reinstatement to his former position of employment or, if that position no longer exists, to substantially equivalent employment, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights or privileges previously enjoyed. Said backpay is to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (962)

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, I hereby issue—pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act—the following recommended order.

ORDER[15]

The Respondent, King Trucking Company, Burlington, Kentucky, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Discharging employees because they have engaged in protected concerted activity.

(b) Discouraging membership in the Union, or any other labor organization of its employees, by discriminating against them for engaging in protected concerted activity.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which will effect the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer John Swigert reinstatement to his former position and make him whole in the manner set forth in the section entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post in its office and provide each of its driver employees with a copy of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[16] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being duly signed by an authorized representative of Respondent, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days therefter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 9, in writing, within 20 days from the effective date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

[14] Swigert testified that he applied for unemployment compensation on the basis of having been fired.

[15] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[16] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

December 16, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On June 27, 1980, Administrative Law Judge James L. Rose issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, counsel for the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent filed a brief in support of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge only to the extent consistent herewith.

The Administrative Law Judge found, and we agree, that Respondent, through its supervisor, Jarratt, did not threaten its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The Administrative Law Judge also found, and we agree, that Respondent, through its part owner, Harvey J. Hall, did not interrogate its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The General Counsel excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's failure to find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging employees Mason and Campbell for engaging in protected concerted activity. The General Counsel also excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's failure to find that Respondent, by Jarratt and its attorney, Harvey Lee Hall, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating employees Mason and Campbell about their protected concerted activities. For the reasons set forth below, we find merit in the General Counsel's exceptions.

Respondent is a general contractor in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. None of its employees is represented by any labor organization. State law, however, requires that contractors pay their employees "union scale" whenever the contractor is engaged in work for the State. Respondent, in the past, had been ordered to make restitution to employees for failure to pay them the proper wage on state construction jobs.

Respondent had a contract with the State to do construction work at Louisiana State University (LSU). Two of Respondent's employees, Mason and Campbell, felt they were not being paid the correct wage rate for their work. Mason, on behalf of himself and Campbell, filed a complaint with the State Department of Labor. (Both Mason and Campbell had received restitution for Respondent's substandard wage payments in the past, although there is no evidence that either of them instigated the prior complaint.)

Mason's complaint was that he was a carpenter and as such was entitled to $12.45 per hour rather than the $10 per hour he was being paid by Respondent for his work on the LSU job. Campbell, Mason's helper, joined in the complaint.

On November 28, 1979, Doughty, an investigator for the State Department of Labor, came to the LSU site to interview Mason and Campbell regarding their complaint. After introducing himself to Jarratt, Respondent's supervisor, Doughty spoke with Mason and Campbell. After Doughty left, Jarratt approached Mason and Campbell and asked them what they had told Doughty. They said that they told Doughty their names, job classification, and wage rate. Jarratt told them they would not accomplish anything by their actions. In the early afternoon, Jarratt and Hall, a co-owner of the Company, initiated another discussion with Mason and Campbell.

The discussion primarily concerned Mason's wage rate. Mason contends that he was a carpenter and should, therefore, be paid $12.45 per hour, "union scale" for carpenters. Hall responded that, although Mason was indeed a carpenter, he spent about 40 percent of his time engaged in noncarpentry work. Therefore, Hall computed Mason's pay by averaging the rate paid to carpenters ($12.45 per hour) with the rate paid to laborers ($7.80 per hour). Hall concluded, based on this for-

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

Additionally, the General Counsel asserts that the Administrative Law Judge's findings are a result of bias. After a careful examination of the entire record, we are satisfied that this allegation is without merit.

The Administrative Law Judge, in fn. 3 of his Decision, discredited the testimony of employee Jerry Mason that Respondent's part owner, Harvey J. Hall, told Mason that he (Mason) would no longer have a job with the Company if he kept "complaining to the Board," based, in part, on the finding that Mason's testimony was uncorroborated by that of employee Harold Campbell. The General Counsel excepted to this finding and we find merit in his exception. Mason's testimony on this matter was corroborated by Campbell who testified that Hall stated, "If you don't quit complaining to the Labor Board, you no longer have a job here." However, since the Administrative Law Judge relied upon other factors in crediting Hall's denial of any statement along these lines over Mason's contradictory testimony, including relative demeanor, and found that Hall for the same reasons should be credited over Campbell, we do not rely on Mason's and Campbell's testimony on this matter in resolving the issue of their alleged unlawful discharge.

mula, that Mason should be paid $10 per hour. Hall continued:

> And Mason protested that he was a carpenter. And I don't recall how many times we went back and forth between, "but this morning you were finishing concrete." "I'm a carpenter." "Yesterday you were putting up a fence," "I'm a carpenter." And finally, when I decided that I wasn't getting anyplace, I said to Mason, "I don't have a job for a man who is just a carpenter, and that wasn't the basis on which you were hired. I don't have a job for you."
> He said that was the only basis on which he was willing to work.
> And I don't recall whether I said, "Well, you are fired," or he said, "Well, I quit," or whether we just turned our backs on each other and just left. I don't remember.

Hall told Campbell (Mason's helper) that there would be no work for him now that Mason was not working. Regarding Campbell's termination, Hall testified, "I suppose that is firing him, yes. I guess that would be a correct way to say it."

The Administrative Law Judge found, and we agree, that Mason and Campbell were engaged in protected concerted activity in pursuing their wage claim under state law. The Administrative Law Judge further found, and we agree, that "employees may present a wage claim to an employer, and the employer may not discharge them for this reason." The Administrative Law Judge concluded, however, that Mason and Campbell were not fired for engaging in these activities. The Administrative Law Judge also found it unnecessary to decide whether Mason and Campbell were fired or quit.[2] Rather, the Administrative Law Judge concluded that Mason was "separated" from his employment because he would not work for less than $12.45 an hour and Campbell was "separated" because, without Mason, there was no work for Campbell.[3]

The discussion between Mason, Campbell, and co-owner Hall was initiated by Hall. Neither Mason nor Campbell affirmatively approached Hall to insist that they be paid a particular wage. Hall sought out Mason and Campbell to explain to them how he arrived at their wage rates. When Hall realized that Mason and Campbell still disagreed with him on the proper wage rate, Hall discharged Mason because, "I don't have a job for a man who is just a carpenter, and that wasn't the basis on which you were hired. I don't have a job for you." Hall admittedly discharged Campbell because he had discharged Mason.

In other words, Hall discharged Mason and Campbell for maintaining the position that was the basis of their complaint to the State Department of Labor, i.e., that they were carpenters and, therefore, should be paid as such. Contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, neither Mason nor Campbell refused to do any work unless it was carpentry work. Rather, in response to Hall's questioning, they simply maintained that, regardless of the exact work they were doing at any given moment, they were carpenters by trade and should, therefore, be paid carpenter's wages.[4]

Based on the foregoing, we find that Hall discharged Mason and Campbell for pursuing a wage claim under state law and concertedly adhering to their claim before him. Accordingly, we find that Respondent unlawfully discharged Mason and Campbell in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The Administrative Law Judge dismissed the complaint allegations that Respondent, through Jarratt, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating and threatening Mason and Campbell regarding their protected concerted activities. Specifically, with respect to the alleged unlawful interrogation, the Administrative Law Judge found Jarratt, a job superintendent, is at best a low-level supervisor in substantially the same level as Mason, that his question was no more than an innocent inquiry among individuals who work together, and that it did not, therefore, rise to the level of unlawful interrogation, citing Pepsi-Cola Bottling Co. of Los Angeles.[5] As indicated above, Supervisor Jarrett was not only present, but was introduced to State Department of Labor investigator Doughty when the latter came on the jobsite to interview Mason and Campbell. Not long after the interview, Jarratt asked Mason and Campbell together what they had told Doughty and then remarked, in effect, that they were not going to accomplish anything by their actions. While we agree with the Administrative Law Judge that Jarratt's latter statement does not amount to a threat, we find merit in the General Counsel's contention that the Administrative Law Judge erred in failing to find that Jarratt unlawfully interrogated Mason and Campbell.

[2] When asked by counsel for the General Counsel if he fired Mason, Harvey J. Hall, co-owner of Kyle and Stephen, Inc., answered: "Under the conditions he was laying down to me, I told him I couldn't have him work for me. I suppose that's telling him he is fired." When asked if he had fired Campbell, Hall answered: "I sent him home until I had a place for him. I suppose that is firing him, yes."

Further, when Mason was asked by counsel for the General Counsel if he had quit his job or had intended to quit his job, Mason answered that he did not quit, nor did he intend to quit, adding, "I done talked to the man at the Labor Board. He said, under their law, they would have to pay me backpay."

[3] In so finding, the Administrative Law Judge relied, in part, upon his conclusion that Respondent was involved in an "unresolvable" dispute with Mason and Campbell. However, contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, the conflict between Respondent and employees Mason and Campbell could be and was being resolved by the State Department of Labor and, in any event, the record is devoid of evidence of any actual "refusal" to work by these employees.

[4] We note that Hall testified that after he told Mason, "I don't have a job for you," Mason replied, "that was the only basis on which he was willing to work." This testimony by Hall is, at best, ambiguous. It is based on Hall's impression of Mason's intent. Further, even if such a statement was made by Mason, it occurred after he had been discharged by Hall.

Unlike the situation in Pepsi-Cola, supra, the questioning here did not arise during the course of a lengthy informal conversation between two passengers in an automobile away from the employer's facility. To the contrary, Jarratts questioning came directly on the heels of the meeting Mason and Campbell had with State Department of Labor Representative Doughty and occurred at Respondent's facility. Jarratt, having been introduced to Doughty, was clearly aware of Doughty's identity when he asked Mason and Campbell "what they told the man," and then informed them that they were not going to accomplish anything by their actions. In these circumstances, this inquiry was directly addressed to their protected concerted activity under the Act. Further, even if the proximity of Jarratt and Mason in Respondent's administrative hierarchy lessened the significance of Jarratt's inquiry vis-a-vis Mason, as found by the Administrative Law Judge, this reasoning falls short as to Campbell who was only a helper. Accordingly, since Jarratt interrogated Mason and Campbell regarding their protected activity, we find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[6]

The Administrative Law Judge also dismissed the allegation that Respondent, by its attorney, Harvey Lee Hall, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating Campbell. In preparation for the hearing, attorney Hall asked Campbell if he knew if Mason had been fired or quit. Campbell replied that the Labor Board attorney told him he was not required to talk with anyone. Hall did not inform Campbell that any statements he (Campbell) made would be voluntary and that no reprisals would be taken against him if he refused to answer the questions. The Administrative Law Judge found that, although Hall failed to comport with the criteria set forth in Johnnie's Poultry Co., and John Bishop Poultry Co., Successor, 146 NLRB 770 (1964), such failure was inadvertent and was not an attempt to circumvent the Johnnie's Poultry standards. The Administrative Law Judge further found the attempted questioning "isolated, inconsequential . . . and of no impact on the principal allegations of the complaint." The General Counsel excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's failure to find that attorney Hall interrogated Campbell in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. We find merit in the General Counsel's exception.

Johnnie's Poultry requires that, when an employer has legitimate cause to inquire into matters concerning an employee's Section 7 rights, such as in preparing the employer's defense in an unfair labor practice proceeding, the employer must follow specific guidelines in questioning the employee to avoid incurring 8(a)(1) liability. Among other requirements, an employer must tell the employee the purpose of the questions, assure the employee freedom from reprisal, and secure the employee's voluntary participation. These safeguards are designed to minimize the coercive impact of employer interrogation and, contrary to the Administrative Law Judge's suggestions, are applicable irrespective of the employer's intent to coerce, the extent of the questioning or number of employees so interrogated, or the remoteness of the interrogation to the alleged unlawful conduct. Since Harvey Lee Hall did not adhere to the required guidelines in questioning Campbell, we find that Respondent interrogated Campbell in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES L. ROSE, Administrative Law Judge: This matter was heard before me on March 27, 1980, at Baton Rouge, Louisiana, upon the General Counsel's complaint which alleged generally that on November 28, 1979,[1] the Respondent interrogated, threatened reprisals, and discharged two employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. 151, et seq. At the hearing, the complaint was amended to allege also that, in preparation for the hearing of thie matter, counsel for the Respondent unlawfully interrogated an employee in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The Respondent generally denied the substantive allegations of the complaint.

Upon the record as a whole, including my observation of the witnesses, briefs, and arguments of counsel, I hereby make the following:

---

[8] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is a Louisiana corporation engaged in commercial construction with its principal office in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. In connection with its business, the Respondent annually receives directly from points outside the State of Louisiana goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000, and during the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint herein received approximately $75,000 in services performed for the United States Army at the Fort Polk Ryan Army Reserve Center in Leesville, Louisiana. The Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

The substance of this matter concerns a dispute between employee Jerry Mason and the Respondent over the wage rate to be paid Mason.

Mason is by trade a carpenter. Indeed, according to the Respondent's vice president (and general field supervisor), Harvey J. Hall, he is an "outstanding" craftsman. Mason began working for the Respondent in about mid-April at a wage rate of $9 per hour. Though the precise time is unclear, in early fall Mason's rate was raised to $10 per hour; however, he felt entitled to $12.45.

The Respondent is a relatively small general contractor whose employees are not represented by any labor organization nor is it a party to any collective-bargaining agreements. However, when the Respondent has contracts with the State of Louisiana then that State's prevailing wage law becomes applicable, the effect of which is to require the Respondent to pay employees "union scale." While application of the prevailing wage law must certainly be more complex than this, the parties agree that such is the effect of the law and such suffices for purposes of this Decision.

In the summer and fall, the Respondent was working on at least two projects for the State of Louisiana both of which involved buildings at Louisiana State University (LSU). It appears that sometime in the summer one or more of the Respondent's employees complained to the State Department of Labor that the Respondent was not paying the prevailing wage. There was an investigation and the Respondent was ordered to make restitution. Thus, for instance, on September 18, Harold Campbell received a check for $39.73 "in full and final satisfaction of all sums due me with respect to a deficiency concerning the payment of prevailing wages on State project No. LDL 5697-alterations to John M. Parker Agriculture Center judging arena for the period 7-13-79 to 9-14-79." Mason testified that he also received such a check. (There is no indication that either Mason or Campbell instigated the complaint.)

In late September Hall called a meeting of all of his employees at the Pitt Restaurant, where they were finishing a job. He told them that the department of labor had checked out one of his jobs at LSU and found him deficient but that he had attempted to learn what was required. He told the employees that the restaurant job was the largest private (e.g., nonprevailing wage) job Respondent had going and it was about to be finished, and thereafter most of the people would be working on prevailing wage jobs. While they might go out on a nonprevailing wage job, most likely further employment would be on prevailing wage jobs and he wanted them to understand what he understood was required by the State's labor board.

For instance, the Respondent employed people as carpenter's helpers, a classification not recognized by the State. Thus, those he felt to be competent carpenters would be paid at the carpenter's wage scale but others, who theretofore had been considered carpenter's helpers, would have to be reclassified as laborers and would be paid accordingly—at a lesser rate. Further, according to Hall's generally credible testimony, it was his understanding that he would have to pay the prevailing wage only for the specific time an employee worked in a particular job classification. But because the Respondent does relatively small jobs, all employees are called upon from time to time to do a variety of job functions throughout the working day. A carpenter who would spend most of his time working as such might nevertheless also put in some time each day as a basic laborer, a cement finisher, an iron worker, etc.

Such was the situation with regard to Jerry Mason. Hall testified that inasmuch as Mason did not spend more than about 60 percent of his working day actually doing carpentry work, with the rest of his time being devoted to tying steel rods, cement finishing, and the like, the Respondent was not required to pay the prevailing wage of $12.45 per hour for each hour Mason was actually on the job. On the other hand, Hall determined that it would be very difficult on each working day to break out precisely the amount of time Mason was engaged in carpentry work as against the time that he was performing other job functions. Thus, Hall told Mason that he felt a flat rate of $10 per hour for Mason would reasonably comply with the prevailing wage requirements.

According to Mason he started on the one LSU project at $9 per hour and in about 2 weeks was raised to $10 per hour, "taking for granted" that he had been put on a salary of $400 per week. This was apparently satisfactory until he was not paid $80 for 1 day he missed work. This is when Mason claims he learned that he was being paid $10 per hour although he should have been making $12.45. Accordingly, he determined in late November to press the matter with the state department of labor and this in turn, inferentially, resulted in an investigation by that department on November 28. (Mason further testified, unconvincingly, that he did only carpenter work, though ultimately admitting that he did other job functions.)

On November 28, following the investigatory interview by the state labor department, Hall came to the jobsite and at that time had a discussion with Mason and Campbell. Present also was Job Superintendent James J. Jarratt. The parties are in general agreement concerning the substance discussed, although the General Counsel's witnesses contend that Hall interrogated Mason and Campbell concerning the investigation by the labor department and then threatened them.

Principally this discussion concerned the pay of Jerry Mason. In essence, Hall said that in the normal course of Mason's workday he did a variety of things from shoveling, which is laborer's work, to concrete finishing and so on. As Hall testified:

> And, Mason protested that he was a carpenter. And, I don't recall how many times we went back and forth between, "But this morning you were finishing concrete." "I'm a carpenter." "Yesterday you were putting up a fence," "I'm a carpenter."
> And, finally when I saw that I wasn't getting any place I said to Mason, "I don't have a job for a man who is just a carpenter, and that wasn't the basis on which you were hired. I don't have a job for you."
> He said that was the only basis on which he was willing to work.
> And, I really don't recall whether I said, "Well, you are fired," or he said, "Well, I quit," or whether we just turned our backs on each other and just left I don't remember.

Hall's version of this discussion was substantially corroborated by the General Counsel's witness, Harold Campbell:

> Mr. Hall was addressing—And, when he was talking, it was mostly dealing with the carpenter's salary, most we were going on, and Jerry Mason being a carpenter, it was mostly addressed towards him.
> Now, he was telling us that when you go on some jobs, you are a carpenter, some minutes you're tying steel and the other, pouring concrete. So, they average them in.
> Jerry Mason said, "I'm a carpenter all the time."
> Mr. Hall said, "Yes, you're a fine carpenter." Then he said to me, "You all do good work."[2]

Even Mason testified that, during this discussion, Hall stated:

> "This is my company, I'm going to run the company the way I want to, I'm going to keep the books the way I want to. The way I figure it, Jerry," he was talking to me, "You don't do carpenter work one hundred percent of the time. Part of the time you tie steel, part of the time you pour concrete, part of the time you wreck forms. The way I break it down, I'm going to pay you twelve forty-five an hour for what time I figure you do carpenter work, seven eighty for the time you are not doing it. The way I figure it, it averages out to ten dollars an hour." He asked me did I agree with that.
> I told him, "No. I been a carpenter for almost 15 years and I expect to be paid as a carpenter.[3]

When Mason and Hall came to a parting of the ways over the wages Mason was to be paid, the question then developed concerning the status of Campbell, who was Mason's helper. Hall told Campbell that until he could find another carpenter for Campbell to work with, he had no work for him either. Thus Campbell was off for a time, although the record does not disclose how long.

B. Analysis and Concluding Findings

1. The discharges

The General Counsel contends that Mason and Campbell were discharged on November 28 because they had engaged in protected concerted, activity; namely, pursuing a wage claim under state law. While I have no doubt that Mason was engaged in activity protected under the Act,[4] I conclude that he was not discharged for this reason.

Based on the credible testimony, I believe that Mason's employment was terminated because he would not work for less than $12.45 per hour and Hall was unwilling to pay more than $10.

Certainly employees may present a wage claim to an employer, and the employer may not discharge them for this reason.[5] On the other hand the employer does not have to accede to their demands.

I conclude that Hall did not discharge Mason because Mason and Campbell concertedly presented the demand for a wage increase or contacted the state labor department. Rather, I conclude that during the course of Hall's discussion about the prevailing wage matter with Campbell and Mason, Mason categorically stated that he was a carpenter and should be paid carpenter's wages for every hour that he was on the payroll. Hall told him that he had no work for one who was "a carpenter all the time." Whether Mason was discharged or quit in the context of this situation is more a semantic nicety than a matter of substance. The crucial element here is that Mason's employment relationship with the Respondent was terminated because he and the Respondent had an unresolvable dispute concerning his wage rate, Mason holding out for $12.45 an hour for all hours worked while the Respondent contended that he was entitled to an average of $10 an hour.[6]

[2] The comma and quote marks are misplaced in the transcript, which is hereby corrected as set forth.

[3] Mason went on to testify that Hall said if he did not like the way Hall was running the Company and keeping books and if he kept "complaining to the Labor Board" he no longer had a job with the Company. I discredit this aspect of Mason's testimony finding him to be generally not a reliable witness. Rather, I believe his recall of this, which is seemingly crucial to the theory that he was discharged for having engaged in protected, concerted activity, was for purposes of this litigation. This alleged statement by Hall does not really fit into the generally agreed nature of the discussion between the parties. And, it was not corroborated by Campbell. Beyond that, I found Hall to be a very candid, credible and straightforward witness and he denied any statement along these lines. Based on their relative demeanor, where there is a conflict, I credit Hall over Mason.

[5] Hale Manufacturing Co., Inc., 228 NLRB 10 (1977).

[6] It is immaterial whether Hall's determination to pay Mason $10 an hour in fact complied with the State's prevailing wage law.

Campbell's termination (or more precisely his layoff) similarly was not motivated by his having engaged in protected concerted activity. Rather, it was, I conclude, a result of Mason's employment having been terminated and the Respondent not having work for Campbell to do.[7] Campbell was competent only to be a carpenter's helper or laborer, although, according to Hall he was a very willing worker.

No doubt Mason and Campbell engaged in concerted activity protected under the Act when they sought to have the state labor department investigate the Respondent, and no doubt they engaged in protected, concerted activity when they talked to that department's investigator on November 28. Nevertheless, based on the credible testimony of Hall, I conclude that these factors had no bearing on Mason's termination. Hall had previously concluded that Mason should be paid $10 per hour, a matter which Mason protested, as he had a right to do. But when Mason in effect announced that he would not work for less than $12.45 each hour, Hall considered him terminated which was his right.

The General Counsel has suggested that Mason and Campbell should be credited and Hall should be discredited. This I decline to do. Based primarily on their relative demeanor, I found Hall to be an exceptionally candid witness whereas I question the veracity of Mason particularly, and to a lesser extent Campbell.

Secondly, the General Counsel contends that, according to the Respondent's own witness, Hall called his office to have the paychecks for Campbell and Mason made up before noon, whereas the discussion took place after noon. Therefore, argues the General Counsel, Hall must have made up his mind to discharge these employees prior to his conversation with them and therefore it would be appropriate to draw the inference that the reason for the discharge was that the state labor department had been contacted.

While it may be that no employer likes to be investigated by a Government agency, there is no evidence in this record to suggest that the Respondent in general or Hall in particular had any particular animosity towards being investigated by the state labor department or had any concern other than compliance with the prevailing wage law. Secondly, since the events took place several months prior to the hearing in this matter, a time error of a couple hours is not unreasonable. Further while the discussion occurred after lunch, the parties involved could very well have eaten before noon. I therefore do not believe that the fact that one witness testified that Hall called in to have the checks prepared prior to noon is critical in determining the outcome in this matter. Again, even Campbell and Mason corroborated Hall's general testimony with regard to the subject matter of their confrontation, in which there is no indication that Hall had predetermined to terminate either of them.

Finally, the General Counsel contends that because it is an industry practice for one who quits to wait for his paycheck, whereas when one is fired he gets his check that day, Mason and Cmmpbell must have been discharged rather than having quit. Again, the matter of whether they were discharged or quit is of secondary importance. The crucial question is that their employment relationship wae mutually terminated for the reasons noted above. For Hall to make their paychecks available to them on that day, while conceivably relevant, is of insubstantial weight.

Accordingly, I conclude that Mason and Campbell were not terminated because they engaged in concerted activities protected under Section 7 of the Act. Rather, Mason was terminated because he refused to work for the pay the Respondent was willing to pay. Campbell was terminated because following Mason's termination there was no work available for him at that time.

I will therefore recommend that the complaint insofar as it alleges the unlawful discharges of Mason and Campbell be dismissed.

2. The alleged interrogation and threats

According to the undenied testimony of Campbell, when the labor department investigator came to the jobsite on November 28, Jarratt talked to him a few minutes and then told him that Mason was a carpenter and Campbell was his helper. Jarratt left and the investigator began his interviews with Mason and Campbell. Jarratt then returned sometime later, and the three of them ate lunch together. At this time Jarratt undeniably asked Campbell, "What did you tell the man?" Campbell testified that he said, "He asked me my name, classification, how much money I'm making and what do I do." And then Jarratt asked Mason, who told him the same. Jarrett said, "You are not going to accomplish anything."

Contrary to Campbell, who testified that Jarratt was gone, Mason testified that, during the interviews, Jarratt was in the area "pacing back and forth in front of us." Mason testified that after the interviews Jarratt asked what they told the man and then stated, "You know you going to keep on talking to him, you'll get yourself in trouble. All you're going to do is get yourselves in trouble."

While the testimony of Mason was undenied by Jarratt, it is in substantial and material conflict with the testimony of Campbell, which necessitates resolving the credibility conflict between the two General Counsel witnesses.

Based on their relative demeanor, I conclude that Campbell's version is probably more truthful than Mason's. And Mason's recall of this conversation, as with much of his other testimony, is I believe an exaggeration to enhance his case.

I find that, following the state labor department investigation, Jarratt did ask Mason and Campbell what they had told the investigator and then did say something to the effect, "You are not going to accomplish anything." I do not conclude, however, that in this conversation Jarratt either interrogated employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act or threatened them.

Jarratt, although the job superintendent, is at best a low-level supervisor on substantially the same level as

[7] To the extent Campbell's version differs from Hall's, I credit Hall again based primarily on their relative demeanor.

Mason.[8] Jarratt's question was, I believe, an innocent inquiry among individuals who work together and does not rise to the level of unlawful interrogation. E.g., Pepsi-Cola Bottling Co. of Los Angeles, 211 NLRB 870 (1974).

The statement, "You're not going to accomplish anything," does not imply a threat of reprisal.

Jarratt credibly testified that he, Mason, and Campbell, as well as other employees, had had numerous conversations with regard to the prevailing wage rate. Jarratt testified that it made no difference to him whether Mason or anybody else was making $12.45 an hour or not.

I therefore conclude that Jarratt did not interrogate or make threats on November 28 in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

It is also alleged that, during the November 28 confrontation, Hall interrogated and threatened Mason and Campbell. There is nothing even in the testimony of either Mason or Campbell which would indicate that Hall asked them any questions concerning their activity with regard to talking to the state agency or that he in any way threatened them should they continue to engage in such activity.

I therefore conclude that the allegations with regard to unlawful interrogation and threats set forth in paragraphs 6 and 7 of the complaint should be dismissed.

3. The pretrial interrogation of Harold Campbell

At the hearing, the General Counsel amended the complaint to alleged that on or about March 29, 1980, by attorney Harvey Lee Hall, the Respondent unlawfully interrogated Campbell in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Harvey Lee Hall is an attorney and the son of Harvey J. Hall. In his representation of the Respondent in this matter, he sought to interview employees, and specifically Campbell, concerning the events set forth in the complaint. According to Campbell's undisputed testimony, Hall asked him what had happened to Jerry Mason—whether he had been fired or quit. Campbell told Hall that he had been advised he did not have to talk to anyone and he refused not to talk to Hall. Hall then wrote out and gave to Campbell a statement, which reads in material part:

> As you know, no one with Kyle and Stephen has previously attempted to discuss the events of November 28, 1979 with you.
> This will make note of the fact that you have refused to inform Kyle or Stephen or its attorney as to your impression of the events that date and following. Particularly: Whether Jerry Mason was fired, whether you filed any complaint, or even had a complaint, and the nature of your subsequent treatment by Kyle or Stephen.

Campbell further testified that at no time was he advised by Hall that any statements would be voluntary or that he did not have to fear reprisals should he refuse to be interrogated.

The General Counsel contends that the attempted interrogation of Campbell by Hall was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, citing Johnnie's Poultry Co. and John Bishop Poultry Co., Successor, 146 NLRB 770 (1964).

While it does appear that the Respondent's attorney did not specifically comport to the criteria set forth in Johnnie's Poultry, it is also clear that Hall's failure in this respect was inadvertent and that there was no attempt on his part to circumvent the Board's Johnnie's Poultry standards. Beyond this, the attempted interview was isolated, inconsequential, and occurring when it did, of no impact on the principal allegations of the complaint. There is no evidence that any threats were made or reprisals taken following Campbell's refusal to discuss the matter.

While the failure of counsel to conform to the Johnnie's Poultry standards makes a technical violation of Section 8(a)(1), it would not serve the purposes of the Act to issue a remedial order in this respect. Accordingly, I will recommend this allegation be dismissed.

[Recommended Order for dismissal omitted from publication.]

[8] There is evidence in the record to the effect that Mason had sufficient authority set forth in Sec. 2(11) of the Act to conclude he was a supervisor. The Respondent, however, specifically, does not contend that Mason was.

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On June 18, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Leonard N. Cohen issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief and the General Counsel filed limited cross-exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order as modified below.

The Administrative Law Judge found that Respondent discriminatorily transferred employee William Callaway from its Gridley facility to its Corning facility because of his union and other activities protected concerted activities and refused in a disparate fashion to allow Callaway to work 2 hours' overtime on a daily basis while assigned to the Corning facility to compensate him for travel expenses. Accordingly, he recommended that Respondent make Callaway whole for any loss of earnings, including overtime, suffered as a result of this discrimination.

The General Counsel excepts to this remedy contending that the Administrative Law Judge's finding that 2 hours' overtime on a daily basis as compensation for travel expenses is merely speculative, finding its genesis in Respondent's arrangement with Callaway's vacation replacement. The General Counsel contends that, since Callaway's transfer was discriminatorily motivated, Respondent should be required to make Callaway whole by paying him for both the time he spent traveling to and from the Corning facility and the actual expense of that travel. We agree, for it is clear that except for the discriminatory transfer to Corning Callaway would not have expended either the travel time or money. Accordingly, we shall amend the remedy as follows:

Amended Remedy

Having found that Respondent discriminatorily transferred William Callaway from the Gridley facility to the Corning plant on or about May 13, it is recommended that Respondent immediately transfer Callaway from the Corning facility to the Gridley facility and pay Callaway for the time he spent commuting to the Corning facility and reimburse him for all travel expenses incurred as a result of his transfer to that facility. Having further found that Respondent discriminatorily denied William Callaway the opportunity to work overtime while employed at the Gridley facility during the period of mid-February to on or about May 12, it is further recommended that Respondent make Callaway whole for any loss of earnings, including overtime, from mid-February 1980 to the date he is transferred back to the Gridley facility with such earnings to be computed within the meaning of and in accordance with the Board's Decision in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as set forth in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[2]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Mathews Ready Mix, Inc., Gridley, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(b):

"(b) Make whole William Callaway for any loss of earnings and expenses including overtime and travel expenses suffered as a result of the discrimination against him in the manner set forth in the section of the Board's Decision and Order entitled 'Amended Remedy.'"

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

LEONARD N. COHEN, Administrative Law Judge: This matter was heard before me in Oroville, California, on November 25, 1980.[1] On July 16, the Regional Director for Region 20 of the National Labor Relations Board issued an order consolidating cases and consolidated complaint and notice of hearing based on unfair labor practice charges filed on March 31 in Case 20-CA-15262 by Bili Callaway and on May 15 in Case 20-CA-15354 by General Teamsters Local No. 137, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, alleging violations of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, herein called the Act.

The consolidated complaint, as amended at hearing, alleges that between November 1979 and May 1980 Respondent, through several admitted supervisors and agents, committed various independent violations of Section 8(a)(1) including, inter alia, creating the impression of surveillance of its employees' union activities, soliciting letters of criticism from employees concerning the union and/or protected concerted activities of employee Callaway, threatening Callaway with reprimand and other economic reprisals for engaging in union and/or protected concerted activities, and informing employees that Callaway was restricted both in his movements and in the use of the telephone, and subsequently transferred to an isolated facility because he had engaged in union and/or other protected concerted activity. The consolidated amended complaint further alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by denying Callaway the opportunity to earn overtime, by discontinuing Callaway's reimbursement for travel expenses, and by transferring Callaway to an isolated facility in retaliation for his union and/or other protected concerted activities.

All parties have been afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence and to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Counsel for the General Counsel and Respondent filed briefs which have been carefully considered. Upon the entire record of the case and from my observation of witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following:

I. RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS

Respondent, a California corporation, is engaged in several locations within the State of California in the business of manufacture and retail and nonretail sale of ready mix concrete. Jurisdiction is not in issue. Respondent admits and I find and conclude that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE UNION'S LABOR ORGANIZATION STATUS

Respondent admits and I find and conclude that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts[2]

Respondent's manufacturing operations consist of five separate facilities or batch plants in north central California: Gridley, Chico, Oroville, Yuba City, and Corning, California. The Gridley facility, which sits in the middle of the others, serves as Respondent's headquarters.[3] Each facility employs both truckdrivers and batch plant operators. Additionally, Respondent employs approximately six mechanics who are responsible for the repair and maintenance of various trucks as well as batch plant equipment throughout the entire system. With some rare exceptions, the mechanics are generally assigned to the Gridley facility and are then sent out to the other four plants on daily assignments.[4]

For some years prior to 1977, Respondent's truckdrivers and mechanics employed at the Gridley, Oroville, Yuba City, and Chico facilities have been represented in one overall bargaining unit. The collective-bargaining agreement in effect at the time the instant controversy arose was effective from May 1977 to April 30, 1980.[5]

In either late 1979 or early 1980,[6] Don Lovett, a supervisor directly under Gordon Mathews, Respondent's president, approached Callaway, a mechanic and the "informal" shop steward.[7] Lovett, after first stating that he viewed Callaway as the employees' union representative, asked what the men were going to ask for in the upcoming contract negotiations. Before Callaway had an opportunity to respond, Lovett stated that Respondent was going to stick to President Carter's guidelines and that Callaway should inform the rest of the employees of that fact.[8]

Two separate and distinct incidents involving Callaway occurred during February and apparently account for and form the basis of Respondent's subsequent treatment of Callaway. The first incident occurred while Callaway was working at the Chico facility. On this occasion, Callaway walked into the batchroom[9] where approximately six employees were present and already discussing the upcoming contract. Callaway was asked for his feelings and he responded that the men should seek parity with other similar employees in the area. Callaway added that although some of the employees at Oroville did not believe that they should seek that much, he suggested that the men work together as a group to get a good contract. Callaway, at some point, relayed Lovett's earlier message to the group regarding the guidelines.

A few days following this meeting, Bill Goggia, a supervisor at Chico, approached Leonard Healey, one of the Chico employees who had been present at the lunchtime meeting with Callaway. Goggia asked Healey if he would write a letter or a statement concerning what was said at the meeting. Goggia added that in asking for the statement, he was merely following the instructions of Al DeMuth, the assistant manager.[10] Healey answered that he would prefer not to prepare such a statement or letter, and the matter was then dropped.

The second February incident involved a conversation between Callaway and Steve Landis, a loader-operator at Respondent's Oroville facility. Callaway informed Landis that Landis was receiving $1 an hour less than an employee performing the same function at the Yuba City facility. Callaway then suggested that Landis ask Respondent for a raise.[11] Then Mechanic Supervisor Tom Clark and Oroville's plant manager, Jim Seamon, were both in the area during the conversation and both may have been present during all or part of this conversation.

A few days later, Landis spoke to DeMuth at Oroville and asked about the wage differential. DeMuth answered that he thought it was true that a Yuba City operator was receiving more than he and that DeMuth would get back to Landis. Sometime later, DeMuth in the presence of Seamon informed Landis that he would get $1 an hour raise. DeMuth then asked if Callaway had told him about the wage differential. When Landis answered that he had, DeMuth asked Landis if he would be willing to make a written statement saying that. DeMuth added that Callaway was causing the Company trouble and they needed a written example. Landis answered that he would prepare the statement. A day or two later, Landis called DeMuth and informed him that he had changed his mind and would not make the written statement. DeMuth simply said, "okay," and the matter was dropped for the time being.

[2] The material facts are not in dispute. In support of the complaint, the General Counsel called 10 employee and former employee witnesses. Although Respondent did not call any witnesses, it did introduce documentary evidence relating to overtime assignments of mechanics and the increased output at the Corning facility during 1980. The above account is based on the uncontradicted, and in many respects corroborative, testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses, whom I found to be generally trustworthy. In crediting their testimony, which was adverse to Respondent, I note that many of these witnesses are still employed by Respondent. In these circumstances, it is unlikely that their testimony would be false. See Georgia Rug Mill, 131 NLRB 1304, 1305 (1961), modified in other grounds 308 F.2d 89 (5th Cir. 1962).

[3] The Oroville facility is located approximately 14 miles northeast of Gridley; the Chico facility approximately 35 miles north of Gridley; Yuba City facility approximately 20 miles south of Gridley; and Corning approximately 70 miles northwest of Gridley.

[4] One of the exceptions to this practice was Callaway's transfer in May to the Corning facility. This assignment will be discussed in detail below.

[5] Sometime prior to May 1979, Respondent built and/or acquired the Corning facility. In late May 1979, Respondent and the Union executed a separate collective-bargaining agreement covering the Corning employees employed as truckdrivers, batch operators, and mechanics. This agreement, like the contract covering the other four facilities, expired on April 30.

On May 16, Respondent and the Union executed new 3-year collective- bargaining agreements in the two separate bargaining units discussed above.

[6] Although Callaway originally testified that this conversation occurred in late November, Callaway later in his testimony stated that it occurred in either late 1979 or early 1980. In view of Callaway's February discussions with employees regarding this conversation, it appears likely that it in fact occurred during the early portion of 1980.

[7] Callaway's status as informal union steward was apparently acknowledged as fact by all concerned.

[8] Callaway testified that in March Supervisors DeMuth and Seamon informed him that they had just spoken to Lovett who denied that he had ever talked to Callaway about the upcoming contract negotiations. Callaway was then instructed that he was no longer to be Lovett's spokesman.

[10] While DeMuth was at all times an admitted supervisor of Respondent, it is not clear prior to April precisely what his title or responsibilities were. It appears that at all times he worked out of the Gridley facility. In April, DeMuth was given the responsibility for the ultimate supervision of the mechanics.

[11] As noted earlier, this job classification was not covered by the collective-bargaining agreement.

A few weeks later, Landis received a paycheck showing that he had in fact been given a 50-cent-an-hour raise. Landis called Seamon who said he would check into it. A short time later, Seamon called Landis back and said that that was all he could do and that he (Landis) could thank Callaway for it.

That same day Seamon spoke to Callaway about Landis' raise. Seamon told Callaway that Landis had Callaway to thank for getting only half of the promised raise.

During June, Seamon approached Landis and informed him that the National Labor Relations Board wanted him to make a written statement concerning his conversations with Callaway about his raise. Landis prepared such a statement and gave it to Seamon.

Immediately following these February incidents, Callaway was "grounded" or restricted to the Gridley facility.[12] These restrictions lasted until Callaway was transferred on May 13 on a permanent basis to Corning. Tom Clark, the then immediate supervisor of the mechanics, on several occasions informed both Callaway and the other employees that DeMuth had ordered the "grounding" because Callaway was causing union problems.

In assigning overtime to mechanics, Respondent followed a well-established practice of making such assignment wherever practical upon seniority.[13] Callaway was the most senior mechanic in Respondent's employ. The General Counsel contends that during the period Callaway was grounded Respondent deviated from this practice and denied Callaway the opportunity to take numerous overtime assignments both at the Gridley facility as well as at the other facilities. In support of these contentions, the General Counsel relies primarily on the testimony of Callaway. While Callaway's testimony is not contradicted, it is, unfortunately, vague and lacking in details.

In this regard, Callaway testified that on several occasions between mid-February and mid-April batch belts broke at the Gridley facility which required overtime work by a mechanic. On those occasions, Respondent sent Callaway home after the completion of his 8-hour shift and instead assigned a junior mechanic to work overtime. Callaway stated that he filled out a timecard when he lost this overtime and also filed a grievance with the Union.[14]

In April, Callaway was called into a meeting with DeMuth, Gordon Mathews, Al Azevedo, who by then had replaced Tom Clark as the supervisor of the mechanics, and Tom Sanford, Respondent's attorney. At the meeting, Mathews stated that he could not allow Callaway to be filling out timecards for overtime not worked and, if Callaway continued to do so, he would receive a pink slip (warning notice).

Callaway responded by arguing that overtime assignments were not being made strictly by seniority. Callaway then mentioned that fellow mechanic Richard Watson had submitted a similar timecard for work he had been denied and that Watson had in fact been paid for those hours.[15] Respondent's officials indicated that they were not aware of Watson's actions and they then called Watson into the meeting. Watson confirmed the facts and was then dismissed. As Watson was leaving, he heard DeMuth state to Mathews, "Clark again." The group then continued for a short time thereafter to discuss overtime. Callaway never received payment for any overtime he felt he had been denied.

Callaway further testified to three other specific instances where he felt he had been denied overtime. This entire testimony consists of the following questions and answers:

> Q. (By Mr. Jemison) Okay. Now, were there occasions where you would fave received more overtime than you actually received had you been allowed to leave the Gridley facility; and; if so, can you give us examples?
> A. Yes, I can give you examples.
> Q. Would you do so?
> A. On one occasion when Larry Taber was sent to Corning, which it was known it would be about ten hours of work, and I requested to go and I was denied that request.
> On another occasion, Larry Taber was sent to Oroville and it was late in the afternoon when it was known there would be overtime and I was denied that request.
> Another occasion Gerald Pounds went to Oroville and done some work on a truck and also it was overtime involved and I was denied that request.
> Plus the time at the plant in Gridley which is already on testimony when the batch belt broke.
> Q. So it's your testimony that there was other overtime that you could have received, even maybe days that you worked overtime had you been allowed to leave the facility?
> A. Yes.

In defense of this allegation, Respondent introduced records showing by workweek the number of overtime hours worked by each of the six mechanics. These records indicate that, in most of the weeks both prior to and during Callaway's grounding, Callaway generally worked at least as much as, if not more than, any other mechanic. Notwithstanding this factor, it is impossible to determine solely from a review of this chart that Callaway did not indeed lose overtime work to which he was entitled. For example, during the week of February 3, Callaway worked 11 hours' overtime while Watson worked 16-1/2, and Taber, the most junior mechanic, worked 11-1/2 hours' overtime. Further, for the week of March 9, Callaway worked 5 hours' overtime, Watson 6-1/2 hours, and Gene George, the next to the most junior mechanic, worked 5 hours. Similar comparisons are available for the weeks of March 23 and 30 and April 13.

[12] As noted earlier, mechanics customarily reported to the Gridley facility where they were then dispatched to one or more of the other facilities.

[13] According to Callaway's understanding of the practice, if another more junior mechanic was closer to the overtime work and it was more economical for the Company to use the junior mechanic, he was sent. However, if the overtime required a mechanic to be sent from the plant, the most senior mechanic available was asked first. The collective-bargaining agreement is silent on the subject of overtime assignments.

[14] The record does not disclose the identity of the junior mechanic given the work. Further, it is not clear from the record whether Callaway filed more than one timecard and grievance. Copies of the timecards and/or grievances were not offered at hearing.

On or about May 12, Callaway was informed by Mechanic Supervisor Azevedo that he was being transferred to the Corning facility.[16] Callaway asked Azevedo if he would be paid mileage for the daily round trip of approximately 120 miles. Azevedo answered that Callaway would have to go at his own expense and on his own time.[17]

That same evening, Callaway received a telephone call at home from Gary Huddleston, the plant manager at Corning. Huddleston stated that he had received a telephone call from Mathews and DeMuth, and was instructed to call them immediately if Callaway had not reported to work by 7 a.m. the following morning and to send Callaway home if he arrived late.[18]

Mechanic Watson testified that in the spring he was assigned to the Corning facility to relieve Callaway.[19] During a lunch break that week Watson and some of the other employees asked Huddleston about the fact that Callaway was forced to drive to Corning every day without receiving remuneration for mileage and time. Huddleston answered that, because Callaway was making "union troubles," they were making an example of him.

In late July or early August, mechanic Lawrence Taber was assigned to Corning to replace Callaway who was then on vacation. When this assignment was made, Azevedo stated to Taber that, while he could not pay Taber mileage and Taber would have to make the trip on his own time,[20] Taber, in order to defray his expense, should put in a couple hours' overtime every day, even if overtime work was not necessary.[21]

Timmy Drews, a batch operator and dispatcher at the Corning facility, testified that at some time after Callaway had been assigned to Corning, DeMuth called him and instructed Drews that he was not to allow Callaway in the office for any reason and that Callaway was only permitted to use the telephone when calling DeMuth, Azevedo, or Mathews.[22] During the same conversation, Drews asked DeMuth how long Callaway would be assigned to Corning. DeMuth replied simply that Callaway would be there "until either he quit or other arrangements were made."

Vern Jackson, a mixer driver employed at the Corning facility, testified that Huddleston instructed him not to talk to Callaway. No similar instructions were given regarding any other employee.

Respondent, in defense of the allegation that Callaway was assigned to the Corning facility for unlawful reasons, points out that the production records clearly establish that there was substantial increase in output of concrete at that facility from May on and that the increase required the permanent assignment of a mechanic. Like the overtime records discussed above, these production records are inclusive on the complaint allegation before me. While they do show a dramatic increase in production commencing in mid-May and lasting for the most part until mid-August, they in no way shed any light on the specific question of why Callaway, the most senior mechanic, was selected for this assignment.

B. Analysis and Conclusion

The Board in Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), set forth the applicable test in all cases alleging violations of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) which turn on employer's motivation. First, the General Counsel is required to make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that the protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden shifts to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct.

Here, the General Counsel alleges that Respondent, in retaliation for Callaway's union and/or otherwise protected concerted activities, embarked on an unlawful campaign aimed at both punishing Callaway for his conduct, as well as dissipating, if not totally eliminating, Callaway's influence with his coworkers. A review of the entire record, including the various admissions by supervisors regarding Respondent's basis for its actions, not only merely convinces me, but also in fact compels me to reach the conclusion that the General Counsel has indeed made out an extremely strong prima facie case. Respondent presented little, if any, evidence even tending to demonstrate that any of its actions would have taken place in the absence of Callaway's protected conduct.

[16] As set forth above, it was extremely unusual, although not unprecedented, for a mechanic to be assigned on a permanent or semipermanent basis to a facility other than Gridley. In fact, Callaway himself had been previously assigned to Corning for an unspecified period after Respondent first acquired the property.

[17] Prior to this assignment, Callaway, as with most of the other mechanics, had the use of the company pickup truck for trips to Corning. On the occasions prior to February when Callaway was assigned to Corning on a daily basis, he was "on the clock" during the trip to and from his home.

[18] Callaway testified that he normally reported to work 10 to 15 minutes early and that he had never been reprimanded or warned regarding tardiness.

[20] By memorandum dated April 25, Respondent changed its transit policy to require, inter alia, that personnel who were directed to commence their workday at a given plantsite must get to that site on their own time at their own expense.

[21] Respondent's overtime records show that Callaway was on vacation the weeks of July 27 and August 3. During those 2 weeks, Taber worked 9 and 6 hours' overtime, respectively. During the entire time from May 13 through the time he went on this vacation, Callaway worked only 16-1/2 hours' overtime at Corning, with 9 of those hours coming in 1 workweek.

In February, Callaway, while at the Chico facility, urged his fellow represented employees to work together to demand higher wages in the upcoming contract negotiations. Callaway took this action with the full knowledge that Respondent strongly opposed any increase that exceeded the President's wage guidelines. A short time following this Chico meeting, Supervisor Giggia, on the orders of Assistant Manager DeMuth, requested that an employee furnish Respondent with a written statement of what was said at the meeting. Clearly, such a request constitutes a coercive interrogation of its employees' union activities, and Respondent is not relieved or absolved of any liability for such conduct by virtue of the fact that the request was not accompanied by any threats.[23]

A second event occurred during February which added to Respondent's already existing resentment of Callaway. Callaway informed nonunit employee Landis that he was not receiving the same wage rate as another nonunit employee employed in the same classification at another facility. Callaway then suggested that Landis request a raise to bring his salary in line with the other employees. When Landis requested the raise, DeMuth asked if Callaway had told him of the wage differential. DeMuth then stated that Callaway was causing Respondent trouble and asked Landis for a written statement. As was the case with Healey above, DeMuth's discussions with Landis constituted unlawful interrogation of employees' protected concerted activities.[24]

Respondent's reaction to Callaway's conduct was swift and blatant. In short order, it "grounded" Callaway with the result that it not only prevented him from communicating with employees at the four other facilities, but also kept him stationed at headquarters under the watchful eyes of Respondent's officials. Apparently not satisfied with merely denying Callaway the opportunity to associate with his coworkers, Respondent affirmatively sought to punish him for his past transgressions. Respondent deviated from its established practice of assigning overtime on the basis of seniority and instead assigned overtime on several occasions to junior employees.[25]

In the mid-April meeting with Respondent's management, Callaway was reprimanded regarding the filing of timecards for overtime not worked. The General Counsel alleges that this warning violated Section 8(a)(1). As noted earlier, the record regarding the procedure Callaway followed in disputing overtime assignments is less than clear. It appears that Respondent was not, as contended by the General Counsel, warning Callaway over filing grievances, but was merely warning him regarding the method he followed. In these circumstances, I find that Respondent's conduct does not amount to an unlawful threat.

Respondent in its communication with employees made no secret of the basis for its actions against Callaway. Mechanic Supervisor Clark informed several employees, including Callaway, that Respondent restricted Callaway to the Gridley facility because he was causing "union problems." Respondent further informed first Landis and then Callaway himself that, because of Callaway's role in the Landis affair, Landis was receiving only half of his promised raise. Each of these conversations constitutes unlawful threats in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

On May 12, Respondent transferred Callaway to Corning, the most remote facility within Respondent's five-plant system.[26] Respondent contends that the substantial increase in the production output at the Corning facility, which commenced in May, warranted the permanent assignment there of a mechanic. While this may well be the case, Respondent offered no evidence explaining why Callaway, the most senior mechanic, was selected for this assignment. Once again, the statements and actions of the various supervisors remove any reasonable doubt on the question of why Callaway was indeed selected.

On the evening Callaway received the assignment, Huddleston called him and warned him that DeMuth and Mathews would take immediate action if he reported for work late on the following morning. This warning was given despite the fact that Callaway had never previously received a warning or reprimand for being tardy and in fact had a practice of normally reporting 10 to 15 minutes early for work.

Respondent, during the month prior to Callaway's transfer to Corning, changed its policy regarding both the use of the company vehicles and/or compensation for the employees' use of private vehicles, as well as its policy on compensation for travel time. The record evidence establishes that Respondent applied this new policy in a disparate manner, at least regarding the assignment of mechanics to Corning. In this regard, Callaway was not compensated for time or expense in his daily trips to and from Corning. Yet, when another employee was assigned to relieve Callaway while on vacation, he was expressly authorized to put in 2 hours' overtime each day whether or not work existed in order to compensate him for his expenses in travel. Callaway was offered no such similar opportunity.

[23] The complaint, as amended at hearing, alleges that this incident, as well as several others, constitutes unlawful creation of the impression of surveillance. I do not agree with this interpretation since the actions of Callaway were at all times open and notorious with no attempt on the part of any employee to conduct union business in secret.

[24] Respondent contends that Callaway's conversation with Landis is not protected since Callaway was admittedly not acting in his official capacity as union steward and that Landis was not a member of the Union. This contention, of course, totally ignores the concept of protected concerted activity as distinct from union activity. On the question of whether Callaway's first informing Landis that he was not receiving the same wage as a comparable employee and then suggesting that Landis request a raise constitutes protected concerted action, I find the Board's decision in Richard M. Brown, D. O. and Donald R. Janower, D. O., a Co-Partnership d/b/a Park General Clinic, 218 NLRB 540, 546–547 (1975), enfd. 546 F.2d 690 (1976), as analogous. There, the Board affirmed without comment the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that an employee and a coworker who joined the employee in meeting with the employer solely to discuss the employee's wage rate were engaged in protected concerted activity. See also Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, affiliated with Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, AFL–CIO, 252 NLRB 1124, fn. 2 (1980). In any event, based on the statements of supervisors, it is abundantly clear that Respondent's overriding concern was isolating Callaway and thereby diminishing his effectiveness in rallying the other employees into seeking a substantial raise in the upcoming negotiations. Respondent merely used this incident with Landis as a possible justification for its unlawful actions.

[25] The fact that the record does not disclose with certainty both the dates and the amounts of the overtime Callaway lost while "grounded" does not constitute a barrier to reaching the obvious conclusion that Callaway was in fact unlawfully denied overtime. I leave for the compliance stage resolution of the question of how much overtime Callaway lost.

[26] As set forth above, not only was the Corning facility located some 70 miles from Gridley, it was also the one facility that had its own collective-bargaining agreement.

Respondent further placed restrictions on Callaway even when at the Corning facility. Employees were told not to associate with him and he was specifically prohibited from using the telephone except when speaking to one of Respondent's managers. This restriction was not applicable to any other employee.

Respondent's purposes for transferring Callaway were clear. Huddleston informed employee Watson that Callaway was transferred because he was making "union troubles," and Respondent was making an example of him. DeMuth, in a conversation with employee Drews, explained further when he stated that Callaway would be assigned to Corning "until either he quit or other arrangements were made." These statements, like Supervisor Clark's earlier ones, not only established the purpose behind Respondent's conduct, but also constituted unlawful coercive threats to other employees should they also wish to cause Respondent problems by making "union troubles."

Finally, the complaint alleges that Respondent further violated Section 8(a)(1) when Supervisor Seamon instructed employee Landis that the National Labor Relations Board wanted Landis to prepare a written statement concerning Callaway's conversation with him about his wage rate. The evidence does not establish that Landis was informed of the purpose of the request,[27] was assured that no reprisals would take place against him, and/or that his participation was on a voluntary basis. Johnnie's Poultry Co. and John Bishop Poultry Co., Successor, 146 NLRB 770, 775 (1964). Clearly, Seamon's request did not meet these requirements.

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section II, above, occurring in connection with Respondent's operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

IV. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices, it will be recommended that Respondent cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent discriminatorily denied William Callaway the opportunity to work overtime while employed at the Gridley facility during the period of mid-February to on or about May 12, transferred Callaway from the Gridley facility to the Corning plant on or about May 13, and further refused to allow Callaway to work 2 hours' overtime on a daily basis to compensate him for travel expenses, it is recommended that Respondent immediately transfer Callaway from the Corning facility to the Gridley facility. It is further recommended that Respondent make Callaway whole for any loss of earnings, including overtime, from mid-February 1980 to the date he is transferred back to the Gridley facility with such earnings to be computed within the meaning and in accordance with the Board's Decisions in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[28]

Upon the basis of the above findings of fact and upon the entire record in this case, I make the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Mathews Ready Mix, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. General Teamsters Local No. 137, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By discriminatorily denying William Callaway the opportunity to work overtime from mid-February to mid-May while employed at the Gridley facility, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

4. By transferring Callaway on or about May 13 from the Gridley facility to the Corning facility because of Callaway's union and other protected concerted activities, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. By refusing in a disparate fashion to permit Callaway to work 2 hours' overtime daily while assigned to the Corning facility in order to compensate him for travel expenses, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

6. By interrogating employees concerning their union and other protected concerted activities, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. By requesting employees to furnish the National Labor Relations Board with written statements concerning its employees' protected concerted activities, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

8. By informing employees that Respondent denied overtime opportunities to Callaway, transferred Callaway to the Corning facility, and disparately refused to permit Callaway to work overtime to compensate for his travel expenses, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

9. Respondent did not violate the Act by any other conduct as alleged in the complaint, as amended at the hearing.

[27] If in fact the Board agent conducting the investigation of the unfair labor practice had even informed Respondent that he wished to have Landis prepare such a statement.

[28] See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record in this proceeding, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[29]

The Respondent, Mathews Ready Mix, Inc., Gridley, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Denying its employees the opportunity to work overtime because of the employees' union and other protected concerted activities.

(b) Transferring its employees from one facility to another because of the employees' union and other protected concerted activities.

(c) Interrogating its employees concerning their union activities, sympathies, and desires.

(d) Requesting its employees to furnish the National Labor Relations Board with written statements concerning the protected concerted activities of fellow employees.

(e) Informing its employees that Respondent denied overtime and transferred employees from one facility to another because of the employees' union and other protected concerted activities.

(b) Make whole William Callaway for any loss of earnings, including overtime, suffered as a result of the discrimination against him in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director for Region 20, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

[29] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[30] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

December 16, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On July 28, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Robert M. Schwarzbart issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel and the Charging Party filed briefs in answer to Respondent's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, High Energy Corporation, Parkesburg, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Insert the following as paragraph 2(b) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly:

"(b) Expunge from its files any reference to the discriminatory discharge of Robert Burket on May 12, 1980, and notify Burket in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful action will not be used as a basis for future discipline against him."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

It is further ordered that the challenge to the ballot of Robert Burket, cast in the election conducted in Case 4-RC-14152 on May 16, 1980, be overruled and the ballot counted, and that the Regional Director for Region 4 issue and serve on the parties a revised tally of ballots. If the revised tally of ballots indicates that the Union has received a majority of the valid votes cast in the election, the Regional Director shall issue a Certification of Representative. If the revised tally of ballots indicates that the Union has not received a majority of the valid votes cast, the Regional Director shall set aside the election and order a new election to be scheduled at a time and place found appropriate by the Regional Director.

APPENDIX

Notice To Employees
Posted by Order of the
National Labor Relations Board
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

We will not threaten to close our plant if you select Local 1448, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization to represent you.

We will not coercively interrogate you with respect to your union membership, activities, or sympathies, or those of other employees.

We will not threaten you with the elimination of benefits, the imposition of stricter working conditions, or other reprisals, if you select the above-named Union, or any other labor organization, to represent you.

We will not solicit grievances or complaints from you in order to discourage your support for and activities on behalf of the above-named Union.

We will not offer to assist you or otherwise encourage you to form a company union to induce you to give up support for the above-named Union, or any other labor organization.

We will not unlawfully lay off, discharge, or otherwise discriminate against you because of membership in or activity on behalf of the above-named Union, or any other labor organization.

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

We shall modify the Administrative Law Judge's remedy to require that Respondent expunge from Robert Burket's employment records any reference to his discharge and to require Respondent to notify Burket that its unlawful action will not be used as a basis for future discipline against him.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of rights guaranteed under Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

WE WILL offer Robert Burket immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if his job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and WE WILL make him whole, with interest, for any loss of pay or other benefits he has suffered since his discriminatory discharge.

WE WILL expunge from our files any references to the disciplinary discharge of Robert Burket on May 12, 1980, and WE WILL notify Burket in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful action will not be used as a basis for future discipline against him.

HIGH ENERGY CORPORATION

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT M. SCHWARZBART, Administrative Law Judge: These cases were heard in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on February 2-5, 1981, upon a complaint issued July 9, 1980,[1] pursuant to a charge filed by International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers of America, Local 1448, AFL-CIO, herein the Union. Specifically, the complaint alleges that High Energy Corporation, herein the Respondent, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by repeatedly threatening its employees that the plant would be closed if they selected the Union as their bargaining representative; by coercively interrogating employees concerning their own union sympathies and activities and those of other employees; and by soliciting grievances to discourage employee support for the Union.[2]

The complaint further alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging Robert Burket because of his union sympathies and activities. The Respondent, in its answer, denies the commission of unfair labor practices.

Pursuant to a petition filed by the Union in Case 4-RC-14152 and a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election, approved on April 25 by the Regional Director for Region 4, a representation election by secret ballot was conducted on May 16 among the employees of the Respondent in an agreed bargaining unit.[3] The tally of ballots served on the parties immediately following the election showed that of approximately 78 eligible voters 76 cast ballots, of which 35 were cast for the Union, 35 were cast against the Union, and 6 ballots were challenged. There were no void ballots, but the challenged ballots were sufficient in number to affect the results of the election.[4] The Union filed timely objections to conduct affecting the results of the election. In its objections, the Union alleged that in the critical period before the election[5] the Respondent discharged or permanently laid off its employee Robert Burket for engaging in union activity, and threatened employees at various times that the plant would be closed if they selected the Union as bargaining representative. On January 23, 1981, the Regional Director, in furtherance of his Report on Objections to Election and Challenged Ballots, dated July 9, issued his Order that certain objections to the election and determinative challenges to ballots in Case 4-RC-14152 be resolved in consolidated hearing with Case 4-CA-11089.[6]

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to file briefs. Briefs, filed by the General Counsel, the Respondent, and the Union, have been carefully considered.

Upon the entire record of the case and my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following:

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

The Respondent, High Energy Corporation, a Pennsylvania corporation, is engaged at its Parkesburg, Pennsylvania, facility in the manufacture of ceramic and oil-filled capacitors.[7] During the year ending July 9, 1980, a representative period, the Respondent received gross revenues valued in excess of $1 million and purchased materials and supplies valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

[1] All dates hereinafter are within 1980, unless stated to be otherwise.

[2] Although not specifically alleged in the complaint, the Union argues in its brief that the Respondent also violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening more stringent working conditions if the employees selected the Union as their bargaining representative.

[3] The stipulated appropriate bargaining unit is as follows:

> All production and maintenance, warehouse, shipping, quality control, welders, and clerical employees employed at the Respondent's Parkesburg, Pennsylvania, location, excluding all other employees, including guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[4] Four ballots were challenged by the Union and two by the Employer.

[5] In Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, 138 NLRB 453 (1962), the Board defined the critical period before an election as the interval from the date of the filing of the petition to the time of the election. Conduct occurring during this period found to have interfered with the employees' freedom of choice at the polls may be grounds for setting aside the election. Accordingly, in the present case, the critical period is from April 8, when the petition was filed, to May 16, the date of the election.

[6] In the Report on Objections to Election and Challenged Ballots, the Regional Director overruled so much of Objection 2 as alleged that the Employer had shown or played coercive slides, movies, and tape recordings containing antiunion propaganda, and concluded that Objection 1, the remaining allegation of Objection 2, and Objection 3, and the six determinative challenged ballots should be consolidated herewith for hearing.

[7] Capacitors are electrical components that are used in transmitters, satellites, and various electronic products. Basically, on receiving a small charge, capacitors build up greater charges of electricity. The Respondent, through different technologies, produces both ceramic and oil-filled capacitors.

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Respondent is, and has been at all material times herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers of America, Local 1448, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The Respondent, 1 of about 25 operating subsidiaries of Inductotherm Industries, is engaged in the manufacture of ceramic and oil-filled capacitors at its Parkesburg, Pennsylvania, plant. Henry M. Rowan is chairman of the Respondent's board of directors and president of Inductotherm Industries, Robert Q. Buss is the Respondent's president, while Thomas Kennedy is plant manager or manager of manufacturing of the Parkesburg plant. During the relevant period, Earl F. Myers and Joann Johnson were plant superintendents over that plant's ceramic and oil-filled capacitor divisions, respectively.

In March, the Union, with the assistance of warehouseman James Cook and maintenance worker Robert Burket, began an organizational campaign among the Respondent's employees. As part of its campaign, the Union conducted meetings, solicited employee signatures on authorization cards, and, in early April, sent a written request to the Respondent for recognition. On April 8, the Union filed its petition in Case 4-RC-14152 for a representation election, which, as noted, was conducted on May 16.

B. Alleged Interference, Restraint, and Coercion

1. The conduct of Thomas Kennedy—fact and findings

On April 7, Thomas Kennedy[8] met with the Respondent's employees in the Respondent's cafeteria, where they had been summoned by a public address system announcement. During this meeting,[9] Kennedy declared that he had received notice from the United Brotherhood of Electrical Workers that they wished to represent High Energy employees, that he was going to ignore the Union's request, that he was very disappointed, and saw no need for the employees to go to the Union. The Respondent could not afford a union, its chairman, Rowan would not accept a union, and would go out of business if the Union got in. He wanted the employees to know that the Company had an open door policy. If the employees had problems, they should come to him and let him resolve them; if the employees would just walk in and talk to him about their problems he would do everything he could. In addition to the open door policy, employees also would be able to file complaints without having to sign them and to make suggestions by putting them into a complaint box that was going to be set up in the cafeteria. Patricia Robins[10] would be collecting the suggestions. Very shortly, picnic tables, too, would be placed outside the plant.

Kennedy stated that what the employees had was a country club and, when the Union gets in, the country club was going to stop. There would be no more running for coffee and going to the bathroom whenever the employees so desired.

Kennedy observed that the Company was small, was undergoing economic difficulties, and could not afford to pay union wages. When he stated that if the Union came in and demanded $1.50 an hour in wages and new benefits, the Respondent might not be able to afford this, employee James Cook interjected that he did not think that unions ruin a company and that Kennedy was assuming the Union would ask for outrageous rates. Kennedy replied that if the Union did come in and received substantial increases in wages and in the cost of benefits, the Company would be placed at further economic disadvantage and might not have any economic alternative but to close the plant.

According to Robert Burket,[11] after Kennedy had stated two or three times during the course of the meeting that in all probability the plant would close if the Union came in because the Company could not afford to pay for it, Burket had responded that Kennedy was unlawfully threatening employees by saying that the plant would close if the Union were chosen. Kennedy answered that he did not mean it that way, but there was a possibility that the plant would close if the Union came in.

In response to Kennedy's invitation to bring problems to him, Burket had retorted that he had gone to Kennedy with a problem and, not only had Kennedy not resolved the matter, but had not given Burket a truthful answer.[12]

Kennedy testified that the April 7 meeting was held shortly after the Respondent had received a letter from the Union that it had signed authorization cards and that the Respondent's employees wanted the Union to represent them; his first notice of the Union's campaign. Kennedy related that after the arrival of this letter, he and other members of management discussed the matter and decided to conduct the meeting of employees to keep them informed.

At the meeting, the employees were reminded by Kennedy of the benefits they enjoyed and of their favorable work environment. However, under bargaining table regulations, should the Union be chosen to represent them, there would be stricter enforcement of certain work rules. Kennedy denied having invited employees to come to him with problems or suggestions, or having referred to an open door policy or a suggestion box. He also denied having said that Rowan, the Respondent's chairman and president of the parent concern, would not accept the Union.

[8] Kennedy, plant manager at the Respondent's Parkesburg facility, has filled a variety of managerial positions with the parent concern and certain of its subsidiaries for approximately 15 years. At the time of the hearing, Kennedy had held his present position for about 2 years.

[10] Robins is the Respondent's purchasing agent.

[12] Burket's reference was to his earlier unsuccessful request of Kennedy for a pay raise. Burket contends that Kennedy failed to discuss the matter with the Respondent's president, Buss, as assertedly promised.

When, after the meeting, certain employees asked whether the plant would be closed and for what reason, Kennedy had replied that if the Company could not make its product profitably, it would be assumed that the plant would close. The plant's profits then were quite low and any added expense would be detrimental.

Elaine Pearl, secretary to President Buss, testified that she transcribed her following verbatim shorthand notes of Kennedy's April 7 meeting with employees:[13]

> Tom Kennedy read the letter from the Union and also our (HEC's) reply to the Union. He stated both letters would be posted and all communication with the Union would be posted so the employees were informed.
> He stated he didn't know how many employees signed the Union cards and was not interested as he would find out when the total count was taken and it all comes about. Continued, we are a new company here, just getting feet on ground, profits a nil. A lot of pay scales not like Diversified, Lukens, ours are not there. We are well aware. Trying to run a company and get decent profits; can't get blood out of a stone.
> Don't particularly like the idea of a Union coming in, it hampers building a company to the point it might put us out of business. Don't sell idea short. Think before you sign cards, get some facts. Don't think it's going to get new insurance, $1.50/hr. it won't. That would put us out of business. I'm not joking and not making threats. Think carefully. I feel a little bad about this. I know I haven't lived up to everything I said I was going to do, have not kept my promises. You people come in for coffee, things to eat, anytime not just during breaks and nothing is said, think about it. Think about the things you do have.
> R. Burket—You mean the only time you can get coffee is during breaks?
> T. Kennedy—That's Union rules not our.
> R. Burket—That's not so.
> T. Kennedy—That's negotiated at the table.
> R. Burket—You saying the company will shut down if the Union comes in.
> T. Kennedy—It's possible I did not say it would.
> R. Burket—That sounds like a threat to me.
> T. Kennedy—That isn't a threat, if we don't have profits now, Union demands could cause us to shut down. I did not mean it as a threat.
> R. Burket—It's against federal law.
> J. Cook—I've head [sic] from different people time after time raises are due and 3 to 4 months down the road before they get them. I don't think Union's ruin a company. Your assuming that a union asks for outrageous rates. The Union would be these people here and they aren't going to ask for that. That doesn't seem to sit well with me because people have been promised raises have not gotten them.
> R. Burket—We agreed we had a problem. I came to you with a problem the other day.
> T. Kennedy—Yes, I agreed with you and told you I could not do anything but would see the other person.
> R. Burket—But you did nothing about it.
> T. Kennedy—I talked to the other party.
> R. Burket—He said you did not.
> T. Kennedy—(speechless)
> Tom—I stand in fault of some of the so called evaluations and I stand guilty that I have not taken care of in time. Have tried to rectify and in most cases have done so. How about ones I didn't miss, I don't hear about them. . . .

Although the accounts of Kennedy and Pearl of this meeting deny or do not include reference to a suggestion box, within a week thereafter, such a box was installed in the cafeteria.[14]

Even from Pearl's notated account of what was said, I find that the Respondent separately violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when Kennedy, during the April 7 meeting, threatened that if the employees selected the Union more stringent work rules would be implemented by restricting coffee and food breaks, and/or that the plant would be closed.

In Gissel Packing Co., Inc., et al. v. N.L.R.B.,[15] the Supreme Court articulated the rigorous standards to which an employer's statement predicting the effects unionization will have on employees must conform in order not to be found threatening. Noting that the Employer's words in such situations are colored by the economic dependence of the employees, the Court ruled:

> Thus, an employer is free to communicate to his employees any of his general views about unionism or any of his specific views about a particular union, so long as the communications do not contain a "threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit." He may even make a prediction as to the precise effect he believes unionization will have on his company. In such a case, however, the prediction must be carefully phrased on the basis of objective fact to convey an employer's belief as to the demonstrably probable consequences beyond his control or to convey a management decision already arrived at to close the plant in case of unionization. . . . If there is any implication that an employer may or may not take action solely on his own initiative for reasons unrelated to economic necessities and known only

[14] The circumstances surrounding installation of the suggestion box and the General Counsel's contention that the use of this box and Kennedy's invitation to employees to come to him with their problems, also denied, constituted unlawful solicitation of grievances to discourage employee support for the Union, will be considered below.

> to him, the statement is no longer a reasonable prediction based on available facts but a threat of retaliation based on misrepresentation and coercion, and as such without the protection of the First Amendment. . . . "Conveyance of the employer's belief, even though sincere, that unionization will or may result in the closing of the plant is not a statement of fact unless, which is most improbable, the eventuality of closing is capable of proof." [Emphasis supplied.]

Kennedy's statement concerning the possibility of plant closure in the event of unionization failed to meet the Gissel standards because the Respondent introduced no evidence to prove that the statements were based on fact or that the eventuality of plant closing was a demonstrably probable consequence of such fact. For the record shows that, while the financial position of the Respondent could be improved, the Respondent pointed up the inaccuracy of Kennedy's remarks when, at a second meeting of employees on May 8, as will be considered below, Henry M. Rowan, the Respondent's chairman, assured employees that the plant would not be closed in the event of unionization.

As Kennedy's statement concerning possible plant closure does not meet Gissel standards in that it did not contain objective facts, his statement appears as part of an effort by the Respondent to instill in its employees the conviction that the plant's continued existence—and its employees' jobs—hinged on the outcome of the election. As such, the statement contained a threat of retaliation in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

I also find that Kennedy's warning that unionization would bring a loss of present benefits and the imposition of stricter working conditions to be further violative of Section 8(a)(1).[16]

Leadman Norman Jelke[17] testified that in May, before the representation election, he had gone to Kennedy's office to discuss problems arising in the weld shop and to gain Kennedy's approval. During their conversation, Kennedy, initiating the topic, told Jelke that if the Union came in the employees would not get better benefits; if anything they would probably lose the benefits they have. Kennedy also stated that if the Union did come in, employees probably would get only one raise a year.

From Jelke's undisputed testimony it is concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by Kennedy's statement that if the employees selected the Union, employees probably would lose the benefits they have and, further violated Section 8(a)(1) by Kennedy's statement that if the Union came in, the employees probably would get only one raise a year.[18]

2. The alleged unlawful solicitation of grievances

a. The supervisory status of Patricia Robins

The General Counsel contends that at the April 7 meeting Kennedy had unlawfully invited employees to bring their problems to him and had promised to install and installed a suggestion box to solicit grievances in order to discourage employee support for the Union. Kennedy, while denying the imputed motive, agreed that he had authorized the construction of the box and its installation some days after the April 7 meeting at the suggestion of Patricia Robins.[19] While the evidence concerning inception of the suggestion box conflicts, it is clear that Robins played a role in its implementation and collected and processed suggestions placed therein.

At the time of the hearing, Robins had been the Respondent's purchasing agent for approximately 2-1/2 years. As such, Robins obtained bids and quotations, negotiated contracts for purchases, and placed orders. Before negotiating, Robins compares the Respondent's use of raw materials over a 2-year period to determine the quantities that might be used during the forthcoming contract period, gathering such data through conversations with salesmen and by noting the prices and scheduled projections. She then requests bids from about five companies and negotiates on the basis of the submitted bids. Robins can enter independently into a purchase agreement for below $1,000, but for more costly contracts Robins must first obtain authorization from the Respondent's president. On those occasions, she recommends to Buss which suppliers should receive contracts. Sometimes these recommendations are followed. Robins also accompanies Buss to inspect the facilities of new vendors to see if they are capable of meeting the Respondent's needs.

From May 5 to August, Robins was assigned a secretary, Debbie Morrison, to assist in her work. Robins had been authorized by Buss to hire Morrison after her request for a secretary had been twice rejected by Kennedy for financial reasons. On receiving approval, Robins interviewed approximately 15 applicants, including Morrison, for the secretary's job, making her selection independently. Robins' first choice, before Morrison, worked for 16 days when Robins decided that she should be discharged. Seeking Buss' approval to terminate the first secretary, Robins informed his secretary, Pearl, of her desire to terminate her secretary for excessive absenteeism. Robins asked if such absenteeism, to the extent described, was grounds for discharge and whether she had authority to fire the secretary. Pearl promised to report back, and, the next day, told Robins that she had stated sufficient reasons for discharge and that the decision was Robins' to either terminate the secretary then or to try her longer to see if her attendance would improve. Robins opted for discharge and notified the secretary that her position was ended. She then, without further consultation or reinterviewing, notified Morrison, her second choice among the original 15 job applicants, that she had the job. In August, Morrison was laid off by Kennedy for financial reasons. The two secretaries were the only ones to work for Robins. Robins, who did not attend management meetings or exercise responsibility with regard to other employees, had interviewed only in connection with the hiring of the two secretaries.

[17] Jelke, employed by the Respondent from October 1979 to August, was leadman over the cans and covers areas in the oil-filled division. Cans are the receptacles used to house capacitors. Although as many as five people have worked in Jelke's group, the parties do not contend that Jelke was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

[19] At the representation election, Robins' ballot was among those determinatively challenged by the Union on the ground that she was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Although Robins was not alleged as a supervisor in the complaint, it is relevant to consider her status at this time as her conduct is germane to the complaint allegation concerning the suggestion box.

While with the Respondent, Morrison worked 5 hours a day, 5 days a week, spending 4 hours daily working for Robins and 1 hour on switchboard relief. Robins determined her secretary's duties and priorities. While Morrison was with her, Robins continued to perform her regular duties, which consumed about 95 percent of her time. The remaining 5 percent was spent in directing and training Morrison, a percentage which decreased as Morrison became more familiar with her work. For Robins, Morrison principally typed letters and purchase orders and did filing, working to eliminate a backlog and to keep Robins current.

From the foregoing, it is evident that Robins, at least during the period relevant to this proceeding, had independent authority to hire two consecutive secretaries, assign work to, and discharge them. The decision to terminate the first secretary clearly was made by Robins. Accordingly, I find that during the relevant period before the election that Robins was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

b. The suggestion box—and Kennedy's invitation to submit problems—facts and findings

Robins testified that the suggestion box had been her idea. On April 11, during a conversation with Buss, she recommended the installation of a suggestion box in the cafeteria to learn employee complaints.[20] Buss corroborated Robins' testimony that it had been he not Kennedy who had approved the suggestion box.

On April 13, Robins took home the box which a maintenance man had made and given her that day. The maintenance man placed it in the cafeteria on the following day. Robins placed a note on the box to the effect that if employees wanted changes, they would have to make known their suggestions. She signed this note so as to inform employees of her sponsorship.[21]

The box is kept locked. Robins has the only key, which she uses to open the box about once a day. It is her practice to keep the suggestions for a while and then submit them to Buss. Robins related that, as a result of certain suggestions submitted before the election, employees were polled and, as they desired, the Respondent installed a different soda machine that dispensed beverages in cans rather than in cups. Before this, no suggestion box had been made available to employees.

Administrative Law Judge Silberman, in his Board-approved Decision in McMullen Corporation, d/b/a Briarwood Hilton,[22] restated the rule as follows:

> The solicitation of employee grievances during an organizational campaign accompanied by a promise, express or implied, that the grievances will be remedied is a violation of the Act. Such conduct constitutes an unlawful restraint upon and interference with employees' self-organizational rights guaranteed under the Act because implicit therein is the promise that benefits will be awarded to them by their employer so long as they are not represented by a labor organization and because it tends to frustrate the employees' organizational efforts by showing them that union representation is unnecessary.[12]

In the present matter, several employee witnesses called by the General Counsel testified that during the April 7 meeting they, for the first time, had been invited by Kennedy to submit their problems to him and learn that a suggestion box would be set up for their ideas and complaints. While Kennedy's denial that he had done this is supported by Pearl's notes of the meeting, it is not necessary to resolve credibility to reach a conclusion concerning the suggestion box. Even accepting Kennedy's statement that he did not refer to a suggestion box during his meeting with employees, both he and Buss testified that they had approved the box at Robins' suggestion. The record shows that the box was duly authorized and installed during the Employer's counter-campaign, within 2 weeks after receipt of the Union's letter requesting recognition, less than 1 week after the Respondent's reply refusing same,[23] and about 1 week after Kennedy's meeting with the staff. Robins, in fact, admitted that she had proposed the suggestion box as a response to the Union's organizational drive.

Noting that this was the first time a suggestion box had been used in the plant, that ideas placed in the box were accepted and implemented at cost to the Respondent, I conclude that implicit in the establishment of the suggestion box was the promise that suggestions or complaints placed within would be acted on or remedied, as applicable, and that by so doing the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[24]

I also credit testimony that Kennedy, at the meeting, solicited grievances by inviting employees to bring their problems to him, for the first time in the context of the Union's campaign, as such conduct is consistent with Kennedy's approach. For the above reasons, it is concluded that this, too, was in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[20] Although nothing was said about the Union when Buss authorized the suggestion box, Robins testified that her recommendation concerning the suggestion box was a response to the Union's letter, dated April 4, claiming majority status.

3. The conduct of Kevin Kuklewski and Peter Phiambolis

The complaint alleging that management trainees[25] Kevin Kuklewski and Peter Phiambolis had engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, the Respondent has placed in issue their status as supervisors.[26] Both men had been hired as salaried management trainees[27] and were working as such during the first half of 1980.

a. Kevin Kuklewski's supervisory status

When hired at the beginning of August 1979, Kuklewski was interviewd by six company officials, including President Buss, his secretary, Pearl, and the then-incumbent management trainee, Doug Zuirys.[28] Buss, the principal interviewer, told Kuklewski that he initially would go to the production floor to learn the product, after which he would become involved in a computer project. Kuklewski's training program would not be rigidly structured. Nothing was said about where the program might lead.

Kuklewski first was assigned to the oil-filled division where he spent 2 to 3 weeks learning about the capacitors produced there.[29] After this, Kuklewski was assigned on a rotating basis to work in several different departments within the oil-filled division, spending about 3 to 4 weeks in the parts department. There, he assisted in the general work of that newly relocated department, helping to move machinery and doing cleanup work. He reported directly to Kennedy.

At the end of September 1979, Kuklewski was transferred to the finishing department as leadman, while still reporting to Kennedy. Kuklewski assigned work to the three to four finishing department employees.

While in finishing, at the request of inventory control clerk Margaret Elizabeth Wright, he was one of those who interviewed James Cook for a job in the Respondent's warehouse, and, as Kuklewski put it, successfully recommended that Cook be hired. Also, in September 1979, soon after the start of his employment with the Respondent, Kuklewski, after an interview, successfully recommended that small assembly employee David Moore be hired. He also effectively recommended to Kennedy that shipping employee David Brown be fired for excessive absenteeism, preparing and signing the supervisor's evaluation on Brown's termination form.[30]

While in finishing, Kuklewski made recommendations to Kennedy with respect to the manning of that department, requesting that additional help be assigned there when he thought necessary. In approximately 40 percent of those instances when Kuklewski sought an additional employee to temporarily assist with the workload, Kennedy would accompany him back to his department to check the amount and type of work that was required. On the remaining occasions, Kennedy would merely grant verbal authorization for the additional help based on Kuklewski's stated need. While Kuklewski could authorize employees who so requested, to leave work an hour early, he had no authority concerning the employees' timecards.

While still in finishing, Kuklewski sent an undated 2-page memorandum to the Respondent's personnel department criticizing the work of Ken Weaver whom, according to Kuklewski's memorandum, management had decided to remove as head of shipping and warehouse and to reassign to work under Kuklewski. This memorandum contained the following paragraph wherein Kuklewski described his duties on assuming the newly constituted position of shipping clerk:

> My task was defined by my supervisors, to identify and remedy the existing problems in the shipping department and expand the responsibilities of the shipping clerk position to include impregnation. The shipping clerk title would be changed to finishing department head. The project was to be started at the beginning of September and completed by the end of December.

In his memorandum, Kuklewski went on to recognize "the failures and inefficiencies" of the current system and its supervisor, specifying their shortcomings in general, Weaver's deficiencies in particular, and to explain why he had appointed Bill Franks, instead of Weaver, to replace him as "finishing department trainee" when he left that department.[31] Kuklewski signed his memorandum as assistant to the president.

From mid-January through August, Kuklewski was assigned to a computer project in the engineering department of the oil-filled division, where he attempted to estimate production costs, measuring material and work times in the performance of certain operations. Data thus accumulated was keypunched into a computer. While so engaged, Kuklewski no longer was considered a leadman and had no direct involvement in production. His contacts with other employees related principally to the information he was seeking, except that a summer employee, with the Respondent during school vacation, keypunched for him. Although Kuklewski gave this employee her work assignments, she technically was under the supervision of design engineer Gary Greiser, and Kuklewski kept Greiser aware of his use of her time.

[25] The Respondent has followed a practice of hiring one or two management trainees annually. Their future with the Company varies.

[26] At the time of the hearing, and since September, Kuklewski has occupied a managerial position with the Respondent as production scheduler in the ceramic division. Phiambolis has not been with the Respondent since June.

[27] All bargaining unit employees and those whose ballots were challenged during the representation election are hourly rated.

[29] As stated, capacitors are electronic components, in various sizes and shapes, that build up a greater charge of electricity than that received. The Respondent produces ceramic and oil-filled capacitors. The ceramic capacitor is made of different types of clay, while the oil-filled capacitor is made of aluminum and steel shells with foil wound in various configurations inside. These are impregnated with oil. The manufacturing processes used to produce these two types are different and the plant is separated into two divisions for their respective production. Few of the Respondent's employees work interchangeably in both divisions.

[31] Kuklewski testified that, in fact, he did appoint Franks to replace him as finishing department head on leaving that assignment and that Franks continued in this role for some time thereafter. Earlier, having been authorized by Kennedy to fill a vacancy in finishing, Kuklewski had interviewed applicants responding to the Company's advertisement and had selected Franks for employment.

Since leaving the finishing department, Kuklewski does not take breaks or lunch at the same time as unit employees. The lunch hour for production workers was 12:30 to 1 p.m. Kuklewski's assigned lunch recess was from noon to 1 p.m., coinciding with that of managers and clerical employees.

Kuklewski participated in the Respondent's efforts to counter the Union's organizing campaign by preparing material for Buss' speeches. He also assisted Buss in writing letters and, in consultation with Buss and Kennedy, scheduled employee meetings at breaktimes. Kuklewski attended most such meetings.

Around 2 weeks before the May 16 election, Kuklewski, at Buss' request, conducted two meetings of employees in the cafeteria during work hours, using a tape player to deliver prerecorded messages clarifying the Respondent's position with respect to the Union's Campaign. Kuklewski began each meeting by announcing that he was going to play tapes and describing what they were about. After playing the tapes, Kuklewski told the employees that Pennsylvania was not a right-to-work State. Kuklewski generally attempted to avoid answering employees' questions.

On April 24, Kuklewski accompanied Buss and Kennedy to the Board's Regional Office as a member of the management group that signed the agreement for an election in Case 4-RC-14152.

Kennedy testified that in anticipation of the election he had instructed Myers and Johnson, plant superintendents of the ceramic and oil-filled divisions, respectively, and Kuklewski and Phiambolis to be very careful about what they said to employees; not to make promises, intimidate anyone, or make threats. Kennedy explained that he did not also so instruct his lead personnel as they were hourly paid.

From the foregoing, it is clear that, while a management trainee, Kuklewski enjoyed a special status distinct from that of rank-and-file employees. As leadman in finishing, he had the power to assign work, make effective recommendations concerning hire, discharge, supervisory replacement and manning requirements affecting his department, and, as he actively did, signing a memorandum as assistant to the president and an employee termination notice as supervisor. After leaving the leadman's position to work on the computer project, he continued to be held out and regarded by the Respondent as a member of management. Accordingly, he not only was instructed by Kennedy as to how to conduct himself with employees and assisted in the Employer's efforts to counter the Union's campaign in helping Buss prepare speeches and letters, but also was presented as a management representative at two meetings with employees to help present the Respondent's position against the Union's campaign. He was part of the management group that met at the Board's Regional Office to sign the agreement for a representation election.

From the foregoing, I find that at all material times Kuklewski was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act, was so regarded by Kennedy, and, in any event, was so held out as a management representative that employees would believe that he spoke for management.[32]

b. Peter Phiambolis' supervisory status

Phiambolis, who like Kuklewski, was a salaried management trainee, was with the Respondent from August 1979 to the end of June 1980.[33] Kennedy and Kuklewski testified that Phiambolis, like Kuklewski, reported to Kennedy. Phiambolis, too, was assigned to rotate among several departments, including parts, finishing, and small and large assembly, so as to gain familiarity with the plant's operation.

Leadman Norman Jelke testified that on November 30, 1979, the day that welder Dave Rogers left the Respondent's employ, he was called into Kennedy's office by Phiambolis. There, Kennedy, in Phiambolis' presence, told Jelke that he was going to be responsible for the work going out of the weld shop, that Phiambolis would be telling him certain things that he wanted done and that Jelke would have to do them.

Thereafter, Jelke received work assignments from Phiambolis, who also set Jelke's work priorities, taking Jelke off what he was doing at given times to immediately attend to other work.

Kennedy's initial testimony that Phiambolis had not signed any employee termination notices was countered by the General Counsel's introduction of two such notices, dated October 31, 1979, and February 1, wherein Phiambolis detailed the reasons for the respective discharges.

From the foregoing, noting that Phiambolis was authorized to assign work independently, to set work priorities, and to evaluate employees, in the context of the broad range of supervisory duties afforded Kuklewski, the other management trainee, it is found that in the first half of 1980 Phiambolis was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. In so concluding, it is further noted that the Respondent regarded Phiambolis, as well as Kuklewski, as supervisors, not only by allowing both to sign employee termination notices as such, but also in having separately instructed them as to how to conduct themselves toward employees during the Union's organizational campaign.

c. Kuklewski's conduct—facts and findings

Leadman Norman Jelke testified that, after attending Kennedy's April 7 meeting with employees in the cafeteria, he was told by Kuklewski that the employees were foolish to bring the Union into the plant. If the Union came in, it definitely would make things worse instead of better. Jelke did not reply. As this statement was merely an expression of sentiment, unaccompanied by interrogation, threat of reprisal, or promise of benefit, I conclude that it was not violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Maintenance employee Robert Burket testified that during the first week in May he was approached by Kuklewski in the shipping department, who told him that if the Union got in the plant would be closed because management did not understand unions; they would not be able to handle the Union which would overwhelm the Company. Kuklewski continued that the employees should form their own union, a company union. If they did that, the Respondent would help them form the union, write the rules, and provide general assistance. An outside union would require very costly dues and the employees would not be able to get anything in return. If there were an inside union, there probably would not be any dues.

During that conversation, Kuklewski stated that if the Union did come in Hank Rowan would close the plant because he did not like unions and would not tolerate them in one of his plants. Rowan had closed many plants and he would close this one, too. Kuklewski declared that all these union problems were the fault of Tom Kennedy. Kennedy would promise the employees something one day and forget the next day. According to Burket, Kuklewski declared that Tom Kennedy was getting old and that he was going to replace Kennedy.

Kuklewski, in turn, testified that some time before the agreement for an election was signed on April 24, he encountered warehousemen James Cook and Burket while passing through the plant. They were joined by another employee, no longer employed by the Respondent, who was working nearby. When Cook asked Kuklewski if Rowan or Buss would close down the plant if the people elected the Union, he had replied that if that was their intention that is what they would do. If that was not their intention they would not do that. He denied having information concerning plant closure.

Although other matters were discussed, Kuklewski could not recall them. Burket remained after the others had left and told Kuklewski that he was upset by a number of things arising from his treatment by High Energy. When Kuklewski told Burket that it sounded as though he was taking these matters personally, Burket replied forcefully that he was. Kuklewski vaguely recalled some reference to Burket's dissatisfaction with wages.

Kuklewski averring that the above was his only conversation with Burket, denied having stated that management could not handle the Union, that the plant would be closed, or that Rowan would not tolerate the Union and had closed other plants. He similarly denied having made like statements to any other employees.

I credit Burket's account of what Kuklewski had said to him before the representation election, as Burket's testimony, unlike Kuklewski, was detailed, precise, and rendered with authority. In addition, from Jelke's undisputed testimony, described above, Kuklewski had expressed a strong antiunion bias to him following Kennedy's meeting with employees where Kennedy, too, had threatened plant closure if employees selected the Union. Accordingly, noting that Kuklewski's conduct, as described by Burket, was consistent with other conduct imputable to the Respondent, it is concluded that Kuklewski's repetitive statements to Burket that the plant would be closed if the employees selected the Union violated Section 8(a)(1) of he Act. I also find that Kuklewski's accompanying suggestion to Burket that the employees should form a company union with the Employer's help also was an unlawful offer of assistance in violation of Section 8(a)(1).[34]

d. Phiambolis' conduct—facts and findings

Jelke testified that approximately 8 days before the election he was approached by Phiambolis, who asked how Jelke was going to vote and if he knew how anyone else was going to vote. When Jelke did not respond, Phiambolis stated that Rowan would close down the plant if the Union came in.

Employee Peggy Keylor[35] related that on or about April 9 Phiambolis, who appeared tearful, declared in the plant area that he guessed that he would have to look for another job. He was afraid that if the Union got in the plant would close. The girls in the office were concerned as to what was going to happen.

It is concluded from the above-uncontradicted testimony that Phiambolis interrogated Jelke as to his own union sentiments and those of other employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, and further violated Section 8(a)(1) by threatening Jelke and Keylor that the plant would be closed if the Union were selected.

4. Rowan's May 8 meeting with employees

The Respondent contends that Rowan's assurances to employees at a meeting conducted at the plant on May 8 effectively retracted Kennedy's remarks a month before that the plant would be closed in the event of unionization, and later statements to the same effect by Kuklewski and Phiambolis, thereby erasing these violations of the Act.

Rowan testified that he had received a call from Buss who told him that a union election would be conducted in the plant and that he had agreed to Buss' suggestion that he come to the plant and speak to the employees. During this conversation, Buss expressed concern that a rumor was circulating that the plant might be closed if the Union was selected, and asked if Rowan would comment on this matter to assure the employees that the plant would not be closed.

Accordingly, when, on May 8, Rowan met with the employees he told them that he was there because he had heard there was a rumor that the plant might be closed if the Union got in. He stated his desire to assure the employees that this was not the case and that the plant would not be closed if the Union was successful in the election. The Company would not be so stupid as to take such an approach, recognizing that such conduct would constitute an unfair labor practice, and the employees thereafter might find themselves with a union even if they did not want one.[36]

[34] See Womac Industries, Inc., 238 NLRB 43, 46 (1978). Although the complaint does not allege unlawful assistance in violation of Sec. 8(a)(2), I find that Kuklewski's offer to assist employees to form a company union was litigated at the hearing, and was closely related to matters actually alleged.

When Rowan completed his talk, which covered aspects of the election, maintenance employee Robert Burket declared that Rowan's statement was all a pack of lies. When Rowan asked Burket if he would please tell him what he had said that Burket claimed was untrue, Burket retorted that it was not any one statement, the whole thing was a lie. Rowan again asked Burket what he found to be untrue. Burket did not have any specific answer, but merely repeated that the entire thrust of Rowan's talk had been a lie.

Following Rowan's talk at the meeting, Buss apologized for Burket's behavior; he had not wanted Rowan to be embarrassed. Rowan replied that Buss should not worry, he was used to this sort of thing as he talked to employees all the time and had been challenged far more extensively.

Burket's recollection of the May 8 meeting differs somewhat in detail. Burket testified that all employees, including those who worked in the office, were present. Rowan began by stating that he was there because he had heard a rumor in the shop that the Company would close the plant if the Union came in, and declared that this was not true. Burket interjected that that was not a rumor, but the truth; Rowan's own plant manager had stated that the plant would close if the Union came in, in the very lunchroom where Rowan was standing. When Rowan asked if he could prove that, Burket said that he could, and asked that all employees who had heard Tom Kennedy make such a statement raise their hands. Approximately 10 to 15 employees did raise their hands.

At that meeting, according to Burket, Rowan also recalled one contract negotiation that had continued for a number of weeks where the Union had not made monetary proposals, and also referred to another negotiation during which the union representative had come to Rowan in private and asked what Rowan would give him to disappear.

As Rowan's comments at that meeting are not alleged to be unlawful, as Burket agreed that Rowan had declared that the plant would not be closed, and as Rowan's account, even if accepted, would be insufficient to erase the earlier threats of plant closing, no credibility resolutions are required to more fully resolve what was said at that meeting.

> It is settled that under certain circumstances an employe[r] may relieve himself of liability from unlawful conduct by repudiating the conduct. To be effective, however, such repudiation must be "timely," "unambiguous," "specific in nature to the coercive conduct," and "free from other proscribed illegal conduct." Douglas Division, The Scott & Fetzer Company, 228 NLRB 1016 (1977), and cases cited therein at 1024. Furthermore, there must be adequate publication of the repudiation to the employees involved and there must be no proscribed conduct on the employer's part after the publication. Pope Maintenance Corporation, 228 NLRB 326, 340 (1977). And, finally, the Board has pointed out that such repudiation or disavowal of coercive conduct should give assurances to employees that in the future their employer will not interfere with the exercise of their Section 7 rights. See Fashion Fair, Inc., et al., 159 NLRB 1435, 1444 (1966); Harrah's Club, 150 NLRB 1702, 1717 (1965).

Applying these criteria to Rowan's May 8 talk, I find that although there was adequate publication, the notice was not timely, having been delayed for a month from the time of Kennedy's speech so that employees could fully ponder the impact of the earlier threat made by Kennedy and, thereafter by the other supervisors.[38] Rowan admitted no wrongdoing, on the Respondent's part and, most importantly, did not assure employees that in the future the Respondent would not interfere with the exercise of their Section 7 rights by such coercive conduct. He did not address other violative conduct by Kuklewski in offering assistance to form a company union, by Phiambolis in coercively interrogating an employee, or by the Respondent in soliciting grievances. There is no basis in law or in logic for allowing the Respondent to minimize its responsibility for unlawful conduct by partial, selective repudiation.

Summarizing, it has been found that at the various times and in ways disclosed above, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by:

a. Summoning employees to a meeting where they were: (1) Threatened that the plant would be closed if the Union were selected. (2) Threatened with loss of existing benefits, fewer pay raises, and more stringent working conditions, if the Union were selected. (3) Invited to submit grievances to the plant manager to discourage support for the Union.

b. Installing a suggestion box to solicit employee grievances and suggestions to discourage support for the Union.

c. Threatening Jelke that employees would lose benefits if the Union were selected.

e. Encouraging Burket to form a company union and offering him assistance with respect thereto.

f. Coercively interrogating Jelke concerning his union activities and sympathies and those of other employees.

g. Threatening Jelke and Keylor, on separate occasions, that the plant would be closed if the Union were selected.

C. The Discharge of Robert Burket

1. The facts

Burket, a maintenance worker, was employed by the Respondent from October 1978 until his permanent layoff on May 12, 4 days before the election. Countering the General Counsel's assertion that Burket was let go because of his union activities, the Respondent contends that Burket was terminated for attending to personal business at home while on company-paid time.[39]

---

[36] Rowan explained that he previously had been involved in about six Board-conducted elections and knew that certain types of statements could constitute unfair labor practices.

Burket testified that he had been hired by Maintenance Supervisor Earl Myers, who oversaw Burket's work until Myers' promotion to plant superintendent of the ceramic division in October 1979. Burket thereafter reported to John Hawk, who replaced Myers as maintenance supervisor.

Approximately 90 percent of Burket's time was spent working principally alone on a special project; the building of a geconol mixing system to mix oil and additives to produce an oil for use in the Respondent's capacitors. Such oil was to have the properties of a product that the Respondent had been purchasing from an outside supplier and, presumably, alleviate that dependence. When not working on the geconol system, Burket did maintenance work in the oil-filled division.

In building the geconol system, Burket worked from hand-drawn designs less detailed than a blueprint. Pipelines, fittings, and various other specifics were designed by Burket. Burket ordered parts for the system as needed and about three times a week it was necessary for him to leave the plant to obtain components and tools as needed. The duration of these trips varied, depending on destination and requirements, but from January 1980 he obtained most of the parts brought in from the outside from suppliers in a town about 8 miles from the plant. Burket also supplied his own tools, some of which were kept at home and others at the plant. Before leaving the plant, he always notified John Hawk.

In March, Burket attended a meeting at James Cook's home, with a union representative and about six or seven of the Respondent's employees, where they discussed how to introduce the Union to the Company. All employees present signed union authorization cards. Cook and Burket took extra cards which Burket distributed among other employees at the Respondent's premises. Burket did not believe that any supervisor with the exception of Hawk,[40] knew about his distribution of authorization cards, he did ask Hawk to sign such a card.

Burket, as noted, confronted Kennedy during the latter's April 7 meeting with employees, accusing Kennedy of threatening to close the plant if the Union was selected, and of failing to keep his promises. Thereafter, during the first week in May as found above, Kuklewski unlawfully threatened Burket with plant closure if the Union came in and offered him assistance in forming an inside union. Burket's confrontation with Rowan during the latter's May 8 meeting with employees where he accused Rowan of falsely denying previous threats that the plant would be closed if the Union came in, has also been described.

Burket testified that on May 12 he reported for work at 7 a.m., his usual starting time. At approximately 8:30 a.m., he told Hawk that a recently purchased extension cord was defective and that it would be necessary to return it to the store. Burket also informed Hawk that he had to pick up a tool from his home. Hawk approved his departure and Burket left the plant between 9:45 and 10 a.m.

Burket testified that using a company pickup truck he went directly to a hardware store in the town of Coatesville, approximately 8 miles from the plant, where he obtained a new extension cord after 10 to 15 minutes of discussion with the clerk.

From the store, Burket went to his home to obtain the needed tool. He explained that, after leaving the truck, it was necessary to go by the garden to enter his house where the tool was. Burket's wife, then in the garden, asked him to show her how to weed turnips. He complied and had been so engaged for about 5 minutes when Kennedy appeared over the front bank of the house. Kennedy loudly asked Burket what he was doing there. Burket, from the garden, called back that he was there to pick up a tool. When Kennedy responded that Burket was in his garden, Burket called back that he was showing his wife how to weed turnips but that he had just stopped in garden. Kennedy replied that he wanted to see Burket when he returned to the plant. Burket went into his house, obtained the tool, and went back to the plant. After entering the plant, Burket asked Maintenance Supervisor John Hawk to accompany him to Kennedy's office to verify that Burket had had Hawk's permission to be away from the plant.

Burket related that at 11 a.m. he, Kennedy, and Hawk met in Kennedy's office. At Burket's request, Hawk confirmed that Burket had gone to his home and the hardware store with Hawk's permission. Burket denied Kennedy's assertion that he had left the plant at 9 a.m., asserting that he had departed closer to 10 a.m., a time corroborated by Hawk. Kennedy announced that they were going to see Buss about this. Hawk returned to the shop and Kennedy and Burket went to Buss' office.

Buss was at a meeting when they arrived but met with Kennedy and Burket in a side room. Kennedy told Buss that Burket was supposed to be working but had been in his garden picking or weeding turnips. Kennedy did not understand why it had been necessary for Burket to be gone from the plant for 2 hours. Burket, Kennedy continued, contended that he had been gone for only an hour.[41] Kennedy declared that 1 hour would have been a reasonable time for Burket to have been away for purposes approved but that Burket was a thief because he had been stealing time from the Company.

Burket pointed out that he had always been a good employee, but all of a sudden the Respondent wanted to fire him. Buss asked what the penalty was for such an infraction of the rules. Kennedy told him that there was no written penalty. Burket interjected that if they fired him he was going to the Union, but if they laid him off, fine. Accordingly, Buss told Kennedy to put Burket on permanent layoff.

Burket's termination notice, signed that day by Kennedy, showed that Burket had been given "Permanent layoff, due to employee observed gardening at home on company time." Burket's comments in the space on the form reserved for the employee was, "I do not accept supervisor's final remarks as true. They are not complete."

[39] The parties stipulated at the hearing that Burket's work skills played no role in the decision to terminate him.

[40] While the Respondent disputes the determinative challenge to Hawk's ballot by the Union based on asserted supervisory status, it readily admits knowledge of Burket's union activities at the time of separation.

[41] It is Burket's position that he had been gone between 60 to 80 minutes.

The Respondent contends that Burket was disciplined on May 12 for abusing company time by gardening at his home while being paid.

Kennedy testified that while in the office of Joann Johnson, plant superintendent of the oil-filled division,[42] on the morning of May 12, she showed him gasoline purchase slips signed by Burket on five different days between April 28 and May 7, asking him whether this did not show that an awful lot of gas was being charged to the truck[43] during that period.[44] Kennedy responded that he wanted to check this out and to know when Burket next went on a trip. Johnson replied that Burket already was out on an errand that morning. At that point, around 10 a.m., Earl Myers, plant superintendent for the ceramic division, entered Johnson's office. Kennedy asked Myers, who, when he was maintenance supervisor, had worked directly with Burket, if he knew where Burket lived. When Myers said that he did, Kennedy suggested that they take a ride. Kennedy testified that his only stated reason to Johnson for going to Burket's house was that he suspected that Burket was siphoning gasoline from the truck. There had been no discussion as to how long Burket was away from the plant.

Kennedy and Myers drove to Burket's address in Kennedy's car. As they passed Burket's home, they could see him and his wife in the garden. They continued on, stopping at a small parking area on the corner where they waited for approximately 15 minutes, until 10:45 a.m. Kennedy then drove from the parking area back to Burket's house, left the car, approached, and asked Burket what he was doing. Burket replied that he had stopped at home to pick up a drill. Kennedy retorted that the drill was not in his garden and that they would talk about the matter when Burket got back to the shop. Kennedy and Myers then returned to the plant.

When Kennedy arrived at the plant, he called Hawk into his office and asked if he knew where Burket had gone. Hawk had replied that Burket had to go to the hardware store at Coatesville and to his house to pick up an electric drill. In response to Kennedy's inquiry, Hawk told him that Burket had left the plant between 9:30 and 10 a.m.

At or about that time, Burket arrived. Kennedy told Burket that they would go together to Buss' office and let Buss judge where they would go from there.[45]

Kennedy told Buss that while reviewing gasoline receipts that morning he had found that a higher amount of gasoline was being charged to the company pickup truck. Suspecting that Burket might be siphoning gas, he and Myers had driven to Burket's house and had found him hoeing in his garden. Kennedy related that they had waited exactly 15 minutes, had made themselves known to Burket, and had come back to the plant. Kennedy stated that he now was there with Burket who was being paid for the time at issue.

When Buss asked Burket if this was true and why, Burket agreed that it was and that he had made a mistake.

After some discussion, Buss went to another office and called Rowan. After telling Rowan what had happened, Buss stated that, in the past, whenever employees had left the plant without authorization while on the clock, they always had been let go. He asked whether a like course should be followed here as a union election was pending and as Burket was active on behalf of the Union.[46] Rowan replied that Buss could not alter his procedure just because the election was pending. He instructed Buss to do exactly what he would have done if there had been no union election.

Buss returned to Burket and Kennedy and discussed discharge. Burket responded that if the Company fired him he would be very violent and cause a lot of problems. However, he agreed to accept permanent layoff. Accordingly, Burket was permanently laid off.

In support of Kennedy's contention that Burket had been using extraordinary amounts of fuel in the company truck, the Respondent introduced receipts showing that Burket had charged gasoline purchases for the truck as follows: April 3—$12.30, April 28—$14.20, April 29—$7, May 1—$13.80, May 5—$12.80, and May 7—$11.65.[47] The record of an earlier state unemployment compensation hearing conerning Burket shows that Kennedy had testified that his suspicions had been aroused after Burket had purchased $14 worth of gasoline when plant superintendent Johnson had filled the truck's tank the same morning on the way to work. As the truck had but a 4-cylinder engine, large gasoline purchases would not ordinarily appear to be warranted.[48]

[44] Others, including Johnson and maintenance man Ed LaMarche, also were authorized to use this truck. LaMarche had fueled the truck twice in March and on two occasions in April. Johnson, who uses the truck on a regular basis, filled the gas tank four times in April. Kennedy explained that Burket had just started using the company truck after Kennedy had instructed him to do so as Burket had been putting so many miles on his own vehicle and that it had become too costly to the Respondent to continue its use.

[46] Rowan testified that when Buss had called him earlier, before his May 8 meeting with employees, he told Rowan about the Union's campaign, stating that warehouseman Jim Cook was greatly over qualified for his job, that he felt that Cook was there as a union organizer, and that Burket, too, was a union instigator.

[47] The May 7 purchase included $2.50 for oil.

[48] The transcript of the state unemployment compensation hearing indicated certain mild inconsistencies in the testimony of both Kennedy and Burket from that given during the hearing in this matter. In this proceeding, as noted, Kennedy testified that he had driven to Burket's home on the morning of May 12 following a conversation with Johnson where she had called to Kennedy's attention the quantity of gasoline purchases charged to the Respondent by Burket. At the state hearing, Kennedy, in explaining his trip to Burket's home, did not refer to such a conversation with Johnson. Instead, he related only his independent suspicions raised by multiple purchases of gas for the truck on the same day and purchasing agent Robins' accepted suggestion of the month before, based on costliness, that Burket no longer be permitted to charge mileage for use of his own vehicle for errands, but, instead, require that Burket use a Company-owned truck. Burket, in turn, also had testified at the state proceeding that, while he had been in the garden on May 12 for what

The Respondent further contends that it was aware for some while that Burket was not effectively utilizing his worktime. Buss testified that in late March, Duane Jenson, a consultant responsible for the design of the oil system Burket was building, expressed concern that its construction was taking too long. Jenson told Buss that it seemed as though Burket was gone half the time getting parts and that the job would never be completed if Burket did not "shape up." Although Buss had hoped that the project would be completed by the end of March, he neither spoke to Burket nor discussed Burket's trips from the plant with other members of the supervision.

Earlier, in December 1979, Plant Superintendent Myers, while driving past Burket's home during working hours, had seen Burket's car parked by his house, but did not see him.

Myers testified that about 2 weeks after the foregoing incident, when he looked for Burket in the plant, he learned that Burket had been gone for over 2 hours. Myers thereupon drove to Burket's home, but, after having traveled about 1-1/2 miles, Myers, seeing Burket driving by him en route back to the plant, around and also returned. On that occasion, Myers had seen Burket depart at around 8:30 a.m. and did not go out after him until around 11 a.m.

Myers did not report the first incident, when he had seen Burket's car parked at home during working hours, to Kennedy until 3 or 4 months later, after the occurrence of several other incidents, when he also had been unable to find Burket in the plant. On the day he went out after Burket, only to follow him back to the plant, he had asked Burket where he had been. Burket replied that he had gone to a certain supplier for parts. When Myers reported this incident to Kennedy, Kennedy merely agreed that Burket had taken a long time for the trip.

Although before becoming a plant superintendent in October 1979, Myers had noticed that Burket, who then reported to him in maintenance, had been gone from the plant for long periods on about three or four occasions, he mentioned only one such instance to Kennedy. John Hawk, Myers' successor as maintenance supervisor, did not call Myers' attention to any subsequent prolonged absences by Burket from the plant. In any event, it is undisputed that before May 12 nothing was said to Burket by the Respondent's management or supervision concerning time he was spending away from the plant during work hours. Burket was never disciplined nor his work criticized.

The Respondent's published "Rules and Regulations of Personal Conduct," issued January 1, provide progressive discipline for various work rule infractions. Accordingly, the rules establish, in relevant part, that employees who frequently are absent from work without proper authorization or reasonable cause (three times in a 30-day period), who habitually fail to punch their timecards, who are absent without authorization from their regular work station, or who "loaf" on the job—in washrooms or elsewhere—are subject to a written notice for the first two offenses, a 3-to 5-day disciplinary layoff for a third offense, and discharge for the fourth offense occurring within a 1-year period of time. It also is provided that employees who engage in personal work of any nature without authorization shall receive a written warning for the first offense, a 5- to 10-day disciplinary layoff for the second offense, and discharge for a third offense. Employees are subject to immediate discharge for, among other things, knowingly punching, or removing, another employee's timecard or permitting it to be done by another.

The Respondent argues, however, that it consistently has followed a policy of immediately terminating employees without prior warning for improperly taking paid time away from the plant while not performing their duties. Gary Greiser[49] testified that on Saturday, January 15, 1979, while manager of the Respondent's Malvern plant, he discharged Allen Linderman, employed there in the assembly area, when he found Linderman's timecard in the rack showing him to be at work on overtime premium pay,[50] but when, in fact, he had gone home 2 hours before. Linderman had not received prior warning before discharge. On Linderman's termination notice, Greiser noted the following final remarks, "Employee caught cheating on timeclock."[51]

Buss testified that employee James McWilliams was terminated when Buss was unable to find him in the plant during working hours in October 1978, following a search. The next day, Buss, without providing prior warning, terminated McWilliams. The reasons for discharge given on McWilliams' termination notice were, "Employee left work before quitting time without permission and had another employee clock out his timecard which is against rules and regulations of company policy." Employee Stephen Bodnar, Jr., also was concurrently terminated without having received prior warning for having punched out McWilliams' card.

2. Discussion and conclusions

Analyzing the above evidence under Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc.,[52] I find that the General Counsel made a prima facie showing that Burket's protected activities were a motivating factor in the Respondent's decision to lay him off permanently. The Respondent's president, Buss, who finally made the decision to discipline Burket, admitted that he knew at the time of layoff that Burket was one of the main organizers for the Union. About 6 days before, management trainee Kuklewski had told Burket several times during a conversation that if the Union came in the plant would be closed, and had encouraged and offered assistance for the formation of a company union. Earlier, on April 7, when Kennedy, during his meeting with employees, also had men-seemed to him to have been 5 minutes, he had not checked the time. He generally appeared less certain as to how long he had been in the garden than his testimony in the present matter would indicate.

[49] Greiser, currently the Respondent's design engineer, had held a variety of positions with the Respondent since May 1973. From October 1974 through August 1979, he served as plant manager of the Respondent's Malvern, Pennsylvania, plant, heading the oil-filled division.

[50] According to Greiser, Linderman had been putting in much overtime.

aced them with the prospect of plant closure and for more stringent work rules if they selected the Union, he was confronted by Burket, who accused him of making a threat.[53] It also is noted that Burket's services to the Respondent were valuable as he was the only employee involved in the skilled work of building the Respondent's geconol system, the quality of his work was satisfactory, and his summary layoff without prior warning or reprimand, timed but 4 days before the representation election, for the reasons stated, contravened the Respondent's published policy of progressive discipline where discharge is rendered only after a series of lesser penalties.[54] Contrary to the Respondent, no clear policy has been followed of terminating employees for leaving work without punching their timecards and instances of prior discharge on these grounds cited by the Respondent are distinguishable. Although Linderman, who had been drawing much suspicious overtime at premium pay, initially was terminated without prior warning for leaving the plant without punching out while again on overtime, his subsequent rehire illustrates that such an infraction is not a final determinant for employability with the Respondent.[55] Also, McWilliams' earlier discharge differs in circumstance from that of Burket as his termination notice affirms that he was let go not only for having left work before quitting time without permission, but also because he had breached company rules by having Bodnar clock out his timecard. Accordingly, McWilliams' offense was multiple because, in addition to absenting himself, he also had induced another employee to wrongfully punch his card—which at the time warranted the summary termination afforded Bodnar.[56] McWilliams' inducement of another employee to engage in an offense calling for summary discharge involved considerations not present with respect to Burket.

The Respondent's other activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1), particularly Kennedy's statement to Jelke, also in May, that if a union came in the employees could probably lose existing benefits and be relegated to only one raise a year, Phiambolis' coercive interrogation of Jelke, and the unlawful solicitation of grievances by both implementation of the suggestion box and Kennedy's invitation to employees to bring their problems to him further indicate the Respondent's hostility toward the Union's campaign.

This evidence submitted by the General Counsel and Union effectively shifted the burden to the Respondent to show that it would have permanently laid off Burket even in the absence of his protected activities. The Respondent's contention that it disciplined Burket because he attended to personal business away from the plant while "on the clock," therefore stealing company time, is countered by the tolerance it previously has shown in this regard. Buss had received reports from Jenson in late March that Burket was taking too much time to build the geconol system, while, from Myers, Kennedy had known for months that Burket had been taking too long to run errands. However, as noted, Burket was never cautioned about these practices.

Noting that the Respondent recognized Burket as a principal union activist; its hostility to the Union expressed through the various acts found unlawful herein, some of which were directed at Burket; the timing of his discipline but 4 days before the election in the context of previous toleration of his prolonged errands; that under the circumstances involved, the permanent layoff afforded, without prior warning, did not conform to the Respondent's published system of progressive discipline; and Burket's usefulness to the Respondent as a skilled maintenance employee principally assigned to building the geconol system, show that such discipline as might have been afforded because of the garden incident would not, without prior warning, have resulted in loss of employment.[57]

In view of the foregoing, I conclude that the Respondent has failed to show that the same action would have taken place in the absence of Burket's protected activities. I, therefore, find that his permanent layoff was in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.[58]

[53] Threats to close the plant if the Union was designated also were made to other employees by management trainee Phiambolis. It had been found above that these threats were not effectively retracted by Rowan during his May 8 meeting with employees.

[54] The work rules breached by Burket which appear most applicable on their face are those prohibiting unauthorized absenteeism by employees from their work stations, idling on the job and engaging in personal work of any nature without authorization. All of these infractions are included under the progressive discipline policy and, in such instances, first offenses do not lead to summary discharge.

[56] When McWilliams and Bodnar were discharged in October 1978, the Respondent's published "Rules and Regulations of Personal Conduct" provided for immediate discharge for employees who knowingly punched or removed the timecards of other employees. Following the McWilliams-Bodnar incident, this rule was broadened to subject any employee to immediate discharge who knowingly punched or removed another employee's timecard or permitted it to be done by another.

[57] Contrary to the Respondent, even the gasoline purchase slips charged by Burket to the Company, and asserted by Kennedy as the reason for his trip to Burket's home on May 12, do not provide a consistent, proximate cause for his going there on that date. Burket's last fuel purchase was on May 7, 1 week before layoff. While Kennedy, at the state unemployment compensation hearing, had taken particular exception to a $14 charge by Burket, the last slip approximating that amount was dated May 1, almost 2 weeks before layoff. Burket made two gas purchases after that. As noted, in his testimony at the earlier state hearing as to reasons for going to Burket's home on May 12, Kennedy made no reference to a current reminder from Johnson concerning these slips and had never asked Burket to account for expenditures deemed unusual.

[58] Pork King Company, Inc., 252 NLRB 99 (1980), cited by the Respondent, is not applicable. There, a shop steward, active in processing grievances, was discharged after he had left the ignition key in his truck while he went into an off-track betting office. This was learned by a supervisor who, on the stated concern that the steward had been taking too long to make deliveries, followed the steward on his truck route. The Board majority found that the steward had been lawfully terminated for exposing the respondent's truck and its freight to theft. In fact, the truck had been driven back to the employer's premises while the steward was still inside the betting office. In the present matter, Burket's infraction of working in his garden, while hardly to be condoned, afforded far less potential for employer loss than did the steward in Pork King, who had placed a truck and its cargo at hazard. The most significant difference, however, is that here, unlike Pork King, where a bargaining relationship was established, Burket's separation occurred close to the time of a representation election in the context of numerous unlawful acts by the Employer intended to discourage union activity and to defeat the Union.

D. The Representation Case

1. The challenged ballots

The Report on Challenged Ballots issued by the Regional Director found that challenges to the ballots of six individuals raised substantial issues which warranted a hearing.

a. Robert Burket

Burket's ballot was challenged by the Employer on the ground that he had been permanently laid off on May 12, 1980. Having found that Burket was discriminatorily discharged by the Respondent before the election in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, and thereby entitled to reinstatement, I further find that he was eligible to vote in the election conducted on May 16, 1980, and, therefore, recommend that the challenge to his ballot be overruled.

b. Wanda J. Wharton

The Employer challenged Wharton's ballot on the ground that she had been permanently laid off on February 15, 1980.

Wharton, who was hired in December 1978, and was employed in painting ceramic capacitors, was laid off twice by the Respondent. The first incident occurred in September 1979, and was announced by Plant Manager Kennedy who notified Wharton and other employees that he had to lay off a certain number of people in each department for a few weeks.

Wharton was recalled that November and continued to work in the ceramic division until February 15, 1980, when Plant Superintendent Myers summoned her and other employees to the office and announced that he was going to have to lay them off for 3 to 4 weeks because of lack of work.[59] Wharton testified that after her February layoff she returned to the plant on a number of occasions to check her recall prospects. On such an occasion in April 1980, she asked Myers how long she would be laid off. In response, Myers asked how long Wharton could collect unemployment compensation, to which she expressed belief that her benefits would not expire for 8 more months. Myers told her that it was his guess that she would be collecting unemployment compensation for that period of time. In June, Wharton obtained employment with another concern, where she was employed at the time of hearing.

At the hearing, the parties stipulated the names and seniority dates of seven employees, including Wharton, who were laid off on February 15 and March 21, 1980. Three of the employees so identified were employed in the oil-filled division and, unlike Wharton, did not report to Myers. Myers explained that Wharton and other ceramic division employees were laid off in February because of work reductions caused by a sales slump. Only the one senior-most employee of those laid off was thereafter recalled on September 8. Wharton was next in seniority.[60]

Myers testified that at the time of the February layoff, in response to questions by affected employees, including Wharton, Myers replied that he estimated that the layoff would last approximately 2 to 3 months. However, sales did not thereafter increase.

Myers related that between February 15 and the May 16 election date, Wharton returned to the plant several times to inquire about her status. During the first such conversation, Myers told Wharton that she might be recalled at some time in the future. However, as time passed, he told her that there had not been much change, that chances of recall did not look good and that he had no way of knowing how long she would be on layoff. The last time Myers spoke with Wharton, he told her that the situation looked even gloomier than before and that he was going to have to lay off additional people, persons senior to herself. Myers does not recall whether in April he had asked Wharton how much more unemployment compensation she could collect.

It is established that the entitlement of laid-off employees to vote in a representation election depends on whether such employees have a reasonable expectancy of recall in the near future. The determination of this expectancy, in turn, depends on objective factors, including the past experience of the employer, the employer's future plans, and the circumstances of the layoff, including what employees were told as to the likelihood of recall.[61] The appropriate time frame when determining expectancy of recall is the situation as it existed at the time of the election rather than subsequent developments.[62]

While Wharton did not know if her job benefits had been discontinued during her first described layoff, she was informed by Buss' secretary, Pearl, that such benefits were discounted following her February layoff.

The Respondent's adverse business climate at the time of Wharton's layoff, while not documented by company records, is illustrated by the stipulation describing the individuals laid off in the same period and what was done with respect to recall. Although seven persons were laid off, none were recalled by the date of the election.

I find it unnecessary to resolve on the basis of credibility any conflicting testimony between Wharton, that she, at first, had been told that the layoff would be for 3 to 4 weeks, and Myers' statement that he initially had given Wharton a hopeful estimate of from 2 to 3 months, as Myers concedes that when the layoff began, he had stated a belief that Wharton would be recalled sometime in the future. However, optimism dissolved as time passed with no improvement in sales. Myers' earlier expressed intent to recall Wharton, without more, is not dispositive of her actual expectancy of recall months later when the election was held,[63] and such hopeful statements were clearly superseded when, as the election day approached, Myers told Wharton that the recall situation was gloomier than before. According to both Myers and Wharton, after the initial layoff period, the latter clearly was given no encouragement as to recall, and her job benefits had been canceled throughout her period on layoff. Her recall from an earlier layoff during the preceding November, in view of the continued furlough of other employees and Myers' subsequent discouragement of her recall prospects, represented no assurance that she could expect recall.[64]

[59] At the time of each layoff, Wharton signed a termination notice that she was being laid off for lack of work.

[60] As few employees could work interchangeably in both divisions because of differences in product and technology, it is not clear that Wharton could have been recalled to a position in the oil-filled division.

[63] Precision Tumbling Company, Inc., supra.

For the above reasons, I conclude that Wanda Wharton did not have a reasonable expectancy of returning to work. It, therefore, is recommended that the challenge to Wharton's ballot be sustained.

The Union challenged the ballots of Patricia Robins, John Hawk, C. Thomas Sheehan, and Margaret Wright as supervisors within the meaning of the Act.

c. Patricia Robins

Having found above in connection with the discussion concerning solicitation of grievances via the suggestion box that Robins, in the preelection period, had been authorized to interview, hire, assign work to, and discharge her respective secretaries, it was concluded that she was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. It, therefore, is recommended that the challenge to Robins' ballot be sustained.

d. John Hawk

Hawk, hired by the Respondent in August 1979 as a maintenance worker, served as maintenance supervisor from January to September 1980, replacing Earl Myers who, during that period, was plant superintendent of the Respondent's ceramic division.[65] When Hawk became maintenance supervisor, the two maintenance workers, beside himself, divided their tasks according to their specialized skills. Ed LaMarche did most of the electrical work, Robert Burket usually worked on the oil-filled side, while Hawk, who continued to perform maintenance services, worked in both the ceramic and oil-filled divisions.

As an hourly rated maintenance supervisor, Hawk spent about 75 percent of his time in maintenance work and the remainder in ordering parts and related paperwork. He spent little time in making work assignments as the men were quite familiar with what had to be done and, having been with the Respondent longer than he, often worked on their own initiative. However, Hawk coordinated their assignments, and requests for maintenance services customarily were filtered through him.[66]

While Hawk was maintenance supervisor, no additions were made to the maintenance staff and Hawk was not called upon to interview, hire, discipline, or discharge any employee or recommend that such actions be taken.[67]

Before Hawk's promotion to Myers' maintenance supervisor position, Myers, while still maintenance supervisor, had effectively recommended the hiring of Burket. Although no pay raises were given to maintenance men while Hawk was maintenance supervisor, in March or April 1980, Kennedy had asked Hawk for a recommendation concerning a pay raise for Burket. When Hawk advised against this, Burket did not receive a pay increase. Also, it is clear from the testimony of both Burket and Kennedy in connection with Burket's permanent layoff, that maintenance employees were expected to seek Hawk's permission before leaving the plant during worktime[68] and that Hawk was responsible for knowing where they were. Employees also would notify Hawk if they were leaving early.

As the record shows that Hawk, while maintenance supervisor, was called on to make an effective recommendation concerning Burket's pay increase, was generally responsible for maintenance work performed in the plant, assigned work on a limited basis, could authorize employees to leave work early, and his approval was required before an employee could leave the plant during working hours on company business, I find that Hawk, while maintenance supervisor, was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. In so concluding, it also is noted that while Hawk was not called on to hire or fire an employee or make recommendations concerning the same, Myers, while in that capacity, had effectually recommended Burket's hire. In assuming Myers' position as maintenance supervisor, without stated limitation, it would appear that Hawk also was vested with authority to effectively recommend hire.

Having found that Hawk during the preelection period was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act, it is recommended that the challenge to his ballot be sustained.

e. C. Thomas Sheehan

Sheehan, during the preelection period, was employed as a working leadman over pressing, machining, and firing (starting) the ceramic kilns. Four employees worked with him.[69]

His duties included setting up the five presses in his department, which then were run by the four operators who worked with him. Approximately 85 percent of Sheehan's time is spent in performing regular production work. During the balance, he does setup work and a certain amount of paperwork.

Assignments made by Sheehan appear to be routine as certain of his operators usually work on the presses and others principally do machining work. Work is generally assigned to employees on the basis of their respective skills and often is based on the job involved and which employee usually works the machine that produces the work required.

[64] All-American Distributing Co., Inc., 221 NLRB 980, 981 (1975).

[65] In September, when Myers again became maintenance supervisor, Hawk was returned to his original position as maintenance employee.

[66] On becoming maintenance supervisor, Hawk did not receive a pay increase, continued to be paid time and a half for overtime work, and received the same benefits as other hourly employees.

[67] As found, Burket was terminated in May. LaMarche was laid off by either Kennedy or Myers in July 1980, but not by Hawk.

[68] It is undisputed that Kennedy consulted with Hawk on May 12 to learn whether Burket had been authorized to leave the plant, his approved destinations, and time of departure.

[69] Sheehan was hired as a leadman and has worked in the same position during his 3 years with the Respondent.

However, in June 1978, Sheehan interviewed job applicant Steven Bodnar, Jr., who, thereafter, was hired. While Sheehan's role in Bodnar's hire is not clear, the record shows that in April 1979 Sheehan completed and signed the supervisor's final remarks on the employee termination notices of Clinton W. Cox and Ronald P. McLaughlin. On Cox's form, Sheehan had written "Excessive time off from work," while McLaughlin's form shows that he was terminated for "Excessive absence from work. Ronald's performance was good when he was working, but personal problems interfered with his attendance."

Sheehan explained that, when he is not satisfied with an employee's performance, he takes the employee to Kennedy's office, which was done with McLaughlin. When Sheehan, on that occasion, told Kennedy that McLaughlin was not doing a good job because he was not there most of the time, Kennedy told Sheehan to take care of it. Accordingly, Sheehan completed and signed McLaughlin's termination notice.

Sheehan, that month, also reported to Kennedy that Cox had missed too much time from work and did not call in. Kennedy told Sheehan to terminate Cox and to fill out the papers, which Sheehan did, effective April 25, 1979.

A third employee, Cheryl Mann, resigned from her job after Sheehan told Kennedy of her lack of interest and lost time. When Sheehan informed Mann that Kennedy wanted to discuss these matters with her, Mann resigned her position. Sheehan reported this to Kennedy and also completed and signed Mann's termination notice, effective November 29, 1979, noting as reasons "Missed time—lack of interest."

Sheehan also initialed timecards for employees who had forgotten to punch in, writing in times of arrival.

From the foregoing, it is clear that Sheehan has authority to evaluate employees and to effectively recommend discharge, which he has done. Having also been authorized to sign employee termination notices as the responsible supervisor, the record establishes that the Respondent had placed Sheehan in a position where employees could reasonably believe that he spoke on behalf of management in bringing about these terminations. Therefore, it is found that Sheehan is a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, and it is recommended that the challenge to his ballot be sustained.

f. Margaret Elizabeth Wright

During the preelection period, Wright worked alone in a clerical capacity in inventory control.[70] She received orders for capacitors from the sales department, checked computer reports to see what was needed to make the ordered capacitors, and determined from other computer printouts if the parts were in the warehouse or had to be ordered. Available parts were set aside, as required. Wright worked closely with the Respondent's purchasing agent, Robins, who, at Wright's request, would place orders. Wright, herself, did not deal with suppliers.

While in inventory control, Wright also worked closely with the warehouse. If the warehousemen did not function properly, this could affect Wright in that inventory reports used in the performance of her duties were not correct. Accordingly, while she was not specifically authorized to tell warehousemen how to do their jobs, she would do so from time to time, partly because of her personal nature and partly because of their impact on her work.

At Kennedy's request, she interviewed Michael Huffman for a warehouse job and, thereafter, reported to Kennedy that she had been impressed with Huffman's ability, had known Huffman personally, and recommended his hire. Thereafter, Kennedy engaged Huffman.

Wright also interviewed James Cook and two other applicants to fill a vacancy in the warehouse. She reported to Kennedy and management trainee Kuklewski that Cook was her first choice. Kuklewski also conducted his separate interviews of these applicants and, according to Wright, the decision to hire Cook was made by Kennedy and Kuklewski.

Thereafter, Wright recommended to Kennedy that Huffman and Cook receive pay increases. Wright explained that, after a probationary period of about 3 months, employees are entitled to be reviewed for pay raises. Wright had reminded Kennedy that Huffman had been with the Company for 3 months and asked if Kennedy would consider reviewing him. When Kennedy asked her opinion, she told him that, in her view, Huffman had been doing an excellent job in the warehouse.

After Cook had been with the Respondent for 3 months, Kennedy asked if Wright thought that Cook was doing a good job. She replied in the affirmative, that Cook was doing a good job and that he should get a pay raise. Thereafter, both Huffman and Cook received pay raises.

Wright, like the others whose ballots were challenged, was hourly paid, received time and a half for overtime work and had the same benefits as unit employees.

Noting that Wright could effectively recommend hire of and pay increases for warehouse personnel and that her views on these matters were sought by Kennedy, it is concluded that she was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. In so concluding, it is noted that Wright had been involved by Kennedy in the process of interviewing various applicants to fill vacancies in the warehouse. While she may have proceeded on her own initiative in injecting herself into certain personnel matters, such efforts were not discouraged by management. It, therefore, is recommended that the challenge to Wright's ballot be sustained.

2. The objections to the election

The Union's objections to the election closely parallel certain of the unfair labor practice allegations set forth in the complaint, including the discriminatory discharge of Robert Burket and the Respondent's several threats, through various supervisors, to close the plant if the employees selected the Union as bargaining representative.

[70] Wright began her employment with the Respondent in September 1978, working in inventory control. Since September 1980, she has been a production leadperson in ceramic assembly.

These unfair labor practices precluded the exercise of a free and uncoerced choice in the election.[71]

Therefore, having sustained the challenges to the ballots of Wanda J. Wharton, John Hawk, Patricia Robins, C. Thomas Sheehan, and Margaret E. Wright, and having overruled the challenge to Robert Burket's ballot, it is found that Burket's ballot should be opened and counted and that a revised tally of ballots be issued. In the event that the Union receives a majority of the valid ballots cast, a certification of representative should issue. In the event that the Union fails to receive a majority of the valid ballots cast, as there is substantial evidence that the Respondent has engaged in unlawful conduct during the period subsequent to the filing of the petition and prior to the election, it is concluded that the Union's objections to the election consolidated herewith be sustained and that a new election be scheduled at a time found by the Regional Director to be appropriate.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with the Respondent's operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that the Respondent discharged Robert Burket in violation of the Act, I recommend that the Respondent be ordered to offer him reinstatement to his former position, or, if such job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent job, and to make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from his discharge by payment to him of a sum of money equal to the amount he normally would have earned as wages and other benefits from the date of his discharge to the date on which reinstatement is offered, less net earnings during that period. Backpay shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Company,[72] with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation.[73]

It also is recommended that the ballot of Robert Burket be opened and counted and a revised tally of ballots issued. In the event that the Union receives a majority of the valid ballots cast, a certification of representative should issue. In the event that the Union fails to receive the majority of the valid ballots cast, the election in Case 4-RC-14152, held on May 16, 1980, should be set aside and a second election conducted at an appropriate time.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by:

(a) Coercively and repeatedly threatening employees with closure of its plant if they should select the Union as bargaining representative.

(b) Coercively interrogating an employee with respect to his union sympathies or activities, and those of other employees.

(c) Threatening to eliminate existing benefits, grant fewer pay raises, and impose stricter working conditions if its employees assisted or supported the Union.

(d) Soliciting grievances from employees to discourage them from selecting the Union to represent them.

(e) Offering assistance and otherwise encouraging employees to abandon support for International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 1448, AFL-CIO, and to form a company union.

4. The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discriminatorily discharging Robert Burket because of his activities and support for the Union.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. The Respondent's unlawful conduct interfered with the representation election held on May 16, 1980.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[74]

The Respondent, High Energy Corporation, Parkesburg, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

(a) Threatening to close its plant if its employees select International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 1448, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization as their bargaining representative.

(b) Coercively interrogating employees with respect to their union sympathies or activities, or those of other employees.

(c) Threatening employees with the imposition of stricter working conditions, elimination of benefits, and other reprisals because of their assistance to or support for the above-named union, or any other labor organization.

[74] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(d) Soliciting grievances from employees to discourage them from selecting the above-named Union, or any other labor organization, to represent them.

(g) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer Robert Burket immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if his job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and make him whole for any loss of pay and other benefits in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this recommended Order.

(c) Post at its plant in Parkesburg, Pennsylvania, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[75] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 4, after being duly signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to insure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 4, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps the Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the challenge to the ballot of Robert Burket, cast in the election conducted in Case 4-RC-14152 on May 16, 1980, be overruled and the ballot counted,[76] and that the Regional Director for Region 4 shall issue and serve on the parties a revised tally of ballots. If the revised tally of ballots indicates that the Union has received the majority of the valid votes cast in the election, the Regional Director shall issue the appropriate certification. In the event the revised tally of ballots shows that the Union has not received a majority of the valid votes cast, the election shall be set aside and a new election scheduled at a time and place found by the said Regional Director to be appropriate.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed insofar as it alleges violations not found herein.

[75] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

[76] As found above, the challenges to the ballots of Wanda Wharton, John Hawk, Patricia Robins, C. Thomas Sheehan, and Margaret Wright have been sustained, and accordingly their ballots should not be counted.

The Bakery, Incorporated and American Federation of Grain Millers, AFL-CIO, Local 58. Case 8-CA-14856-2

December 16, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

Upon a charge filed on May 15, 1981, an amended charge filed on June 4, 1981, and a second amended charge filed on June 25, 1981, by American Federation of Grain Millers, AFL-CIO, Local 58, herein called the Union, and duly served on The Bakery, Incorporated, herein called Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 8, issued a complaint on June 29, 1981, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge and complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on the parties to this proceeding.

With respect to the unfair labor practices, the complaint alleges in substance that on March 23, 1981, following a Board election in Case 8-RC-12270,[1] the Union was duly certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the unit found appropriate; and that, commencing on or about May 11, 1981, and at all times thereafter, Respondent has refused, and continues to date to refuse, to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative, although the Union has requested and is requesting it to do so, and in addition has refused and continues to date to refuse, as requested by the Union, to provide the Union with information necessary for collective bargaining. On July 10, 1981, Respondent filed its answer to the complaint admitting in part, and denying in part, the allegations in the complaint.

On July 23, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment. Subsequently, on July 29, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Respondent thereafter filed a response to the Notice To Show Cause and a Cross-Motion for Summary Judgment.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

In its answer to the complaint, its response to the Notice To Show Cause, and its Cross-Motion for Summary Judgment, Respondent admits its refusal to bargain with the Union and to supply the Union with the requested information. Respondent denies, however, that it thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, arguing that the election held on November 13, 1980, should have been set aside for the reasons set forth in its exceptions to the Regional Director's Report on Objections to Election. Respondent also asserts that, since the Regional Director did not conduct a hearing on Respondent's objections to the election, all affidavits referred to and relied on in his Report on Objections should be included in and made part of the record in Case 8-RC-12270.

Review of the record herein, including the record in Case 8-RC-12270, shows that on November 13, 1980, an election was held pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election in which a majority of the unit employees designated the Union as their representative for purposes of collective bargaining. Thereafter, Respondent filed timely objections to the conduct of the election alleging, inter alia, that the Petitioner engaged in improper preelection offers to waive its initiation fee for any employee who joined the Petitioner prior to the election and that such conduct interfered with the holding of a free election. The objections were overruled in their entirety by the Regional Director in his Report on Objections, issued December 12, 1980. In so doing, the Regional Director stated that the only evidence that was presented concerning an objectionable waiver of initiation fees under N.L.R.B. v. Savair Manufacturing Co., 414 U.S. 270 (1975), was the testimony of an employee witness that she believed she had been told by another employee that the waiver was contingent upon signing a union membership card prior to the election. The Regional Director found there was no evidence that the employee alleged to have made the statement was acting as an agent of the Petitioner and he concluded that such a statement by one employee to another employee would not constitute grounds for setting aside the election. Thereafter, Respondent filed with the Board its exceptions to the Regional Director's Report on Objections, essentially reiterating the allegations and contentions set forth in its objections and citing additional authority in support thereof. In addition, Respondent contended that, if the election were not set aside, the Board should order a hearing on the issues raised by its objections. On March 23, 1981, the Board issued its Decision and Certification of Representative[2] in which it adopted the Regional Director's findings and recommendations and certified the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit. In so doing, the Board found that the exceptions raised no issues requiring a hearing.

By letter dated April 29, 1981, the Union requested a meeting with Respondent to negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement and also requested certain information for purposes of collective bargaining.[3] By letter dated May 11, 1981, Respondent refused, and to date is continuing to refuse, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees and to furnish the Union with information requested by it for purposes of collective bargaining.

In opposing the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment, Respondent contends that the affidavits and other materials relied on by the Regional Director in his Report on Objections should have been forwarded to the Board as part of the record in Case 8-RC-12270 and that the failure to do so renders the certification invalid. In support of this position, Respondent relies on decisions by various courts of appeals, including the Sixth Circuit's decision in N.L.R.B. v. North Electric Company, Plant No. 10, 644 F.2d 580 (1981).[4] However, in two recent cases[5] the Sixth Circuit has recognized that "Congress has entrusted to the Board considerable latitude in resolving disputes concerning representation . . ." and has declared that the "Court should be wary of reversing the Board on procedural irregularities absent evidence of prejudice." Specifically, the Sixth Circuit has reaffirmed the position taken in N.L.R.B. v. Tennessee Packers, Inc., Frosty Morn Division, 379 F.2d 172, 178 (6th Cir. 1967), cert. denied 398 U.S. 958, in which the court said:

> To request a hearing a party must, in its exceptions, define its disagreements and make an offer of proof to support findings contrary to those of the Regional Director. The Board is entitled to rely on the report of the Regional Director in the absence of specific assertions of error, substantiated by offers of proof.

Respondent has failed to meet the criteria set out by the court in Tennessee Packers. Thus, in its brief in opposition to the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment, it failed to provide offers of proof to support findings contrary to those of the Regional Director. Consequently, we find that Respondent has failed to raise substantial and material issues that would require reconsideration of our decision in Case 8-RC-12270.

It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues which were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding.[6]

All issues raised by Respondent in this proceeding were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding, and Respondent does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege that any special circumstances exist herein which would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding. We therefore find that Respondent has not raised any issue which is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.[7]

[3] The information which the Union sought included the wages paid each employee, the classification of each employee, the hospitalization, life insurance, sickness and accident benefits, and any other benefits provided to employees and cost-of-living data.

[4] On October 5, 1981, Respondent filed a motion to take administrative notice of recently effective changes in the Board's Rules and Regulations. In its motion, Respondent directs the Board to the revisions to Sec. 102.69(g) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, which appeared in the September 15, 1981, Federal Register (29 CFR 102; 46 F.R. 45922, et seq.) In response to Respondent's motion, on October 15, 1981, the General Counsel filed a cross-motion in which counsel for the General Counsel also moves the Board to take administrative notice of the revisions to the Rules and Regulations. Both Respondent's and the General Counsel's motions are granted to the extent they ask the Board to take administrative notice of the revisions to Sec. 102.69(g) of the Board's Rules and Regulations which appeared in the September 15, 1981, Federal Register; however, we reject Respondent's argument that these revisions are an admission by the Board that former Sec. 102.69(g) required the transmittal to the Board of statements of witnesses as part of the representation case underlying the proceeding herein. Rather we agree with the General Counsel's assertion that the supplementary information published with the revisions makes clear that in no-hearing cases "witnesses' statements always have been and 'still are' excluded from the record." Thus, the revisions support our finding that the full record in the underlying representation case was forwarded to the Board.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent, an Ohio corporation, is located at 4063 Fitch Road, Toledo, Ohio, where it is engaged in the operation of a bakery. Annually, in the course of its business, Respondent receives goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Ohio.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

American Federation of Grain Millers, AFL-CIO, Local 58, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Representation Proceeding

1. The unit

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All production employees, maintenance employees, and packing employees employed by the Employer at its 4063 Fitch Road facility in Toledo, Ohio, but excluding all office clerical, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

2. The certification

On November 13, 1980, a majority of the employees of Respondent in said unit, in a secret-ballot election conducted under the supervision of the Regional Director for Region 8, designated the Union as their representative for the purpose of collective bargaining with Respondent.

The Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in said unit on March 23, 1981, and the Union continues to be such exclusive representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. The Request To Bargain and Respondent's Refusal

Commencing on or about April 29, 1981, and at all times thereafter, the Union has requested Respondent to bargain collectively with it as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the above-described unit. In addition, since on or about April 29, 1981, the Union by letter, has requested the Respondent to provide information including wages, classifications, hospitalization benefits, life insurance, sickness and accident benefits, cost-of-living data, and information on any other benefits provided by Respondent to its employees. This information is necessary for the Union's performance of its function as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit employees. Commencing on or about May 11, 1981, and continuing at all times thereafter to date, Respondent has refused, and continues to refuse, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative for collective bargaining of all employees in said unit.

Accordingly, we find that Respondent has, since May 11, 1981, and at all times thereafter, refused to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit and that Respondent has since that date and at all times thereafter refused to supply information requested by the Union, which information is necessary for collective bargaining. We find, that, by such refusal, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and, upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. We shall also order Respondent to supply the information necessary for collective bargaining requested by the Union.[5]

[5] See Dynamic Machine Co., 221 NLRB 1140 (1975).

In order to insure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of certification as beginning on the date Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit. See Mar-Jac Poultry Company, Inc., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Commerce Company d/b/a Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817; Burnett Construction Company, 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

December 17, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On April 23, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Edwin H. Bennett issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed an exception, and the General Counsel filed a letter-brief in support of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision, and an answer to Respondent's exception, and the Charging Party filed a brief in opposition to Respondent's exception.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings,[1] findings,[2] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Local 32E, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO, Elmsford, New York, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

EDWIN H. BENNETT, Administrative Law Judge: This proceeding was heard on January 26, 1981, on a complaint which issued November 3, 1980, and on a charge filed on October 17, 1980, by Cadillac Fairview Shopping Centers (U.S.) Ltd. d/b/a The Galleria (herein called the Charging Party or Employer). The complaint alleges, inter alia, that Local 32E, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO (herein called Respondent or the Union), violated Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (herein called the Act), by its picketing of the Employer for recognition in a unit of guards, notwithstanding that the Union could not be certified for such unit because it admits to membership employees other than guards. An answer was filed by Respondent by its attorneys of record, Miller & Bush, in which it specifically denied certain allegations of the complaint and made no response to certain other allegations. The allegations specifically denied were that the Employer employed guards within the meaning of Section 9(b)(3) of the Act; that Respondent admits to membership employees other than guards; and that Respondent could not be certified for a guard unit by virtue of its admissions policy and the provisions of Section 9(b)(3) of the Act (par. 8 (b) of the complaint).

By its failure to specifically deny the other allegations of the complaint, Respondent is deemed to have admitted the following allegations: service of the charge; the jurisdictional allegations of the Employer; and the fact that it is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act, that Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act, that certain officials are agents of Respondent, that Respondent threatened to and did picket the Employer for an object of compelling the Employer to recognize Respondent as the collective-bargaining representative of its guards and security officers and to force or require said employees to accept Respondent as their collective-bargaining representative, and that Respondent could not be certified as the collective-bargaining representative of said employees nor could it file a valid petition pursuant to Section 9(b)(3) of the Act (par. 13 of the complaint). Further, by failing to deny that its conduct described above was in violation of Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act that also is deemed admitted. Nevertheless, presumably because of the specific denials as aforesaid and the apparent inconsistencies in the answer, a hearing was conducted at which the General Counsel proceeded as if it was put to its proof on all material allegations. Notwithstanding proper and sufficient notice of the hearing, Respondent failed to have any representative appear on its behalf and the hearing was conducted with the General Counsel and the Charging Party introducing evidence by way of witnesses and exhibits.

Upon the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Charging Party, I make the following:

[1] We find no merit in Respondent's only exception which contends that the Administrative Law Judge's failure to grant it a further postponement of the hearing was arbitrary and capricious and a denial of Respondent's right to a hearing. The record shows that Respondent's counsel received a postponement pursuant to its request for a new Board hearing date, and, subsequent to the establishment of such new hearing date, established a trial court hearing date which created a conflict with the Board hearing date previously agreed upon and established by Respondent's counsel.

[2] In the absence of exceptions on the merits, we adopt pro forma the Administrative Law Judge's findings and conclusions that Respondent violated Sec. 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act by threatening to picket the Employer, and by picketing the Employer, with an object of forcing or requiring the employees of the Employer to accept or select Respondent as the collective-bargaining agent of its guard employees, although Respondent cannot be certified as a representative of such employees by virtue of Sec. 9(b)(3) of the Act, inasmuch as it admits to membership employees other than guards.

Member Fanning also finds it unnecessary in this proceeding to reach the merits. However, it is his position that Sec. 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act does not prohibit threats by a union to picket an employer with an object to require recognition of a unit guards, nor does it bar a nonguard union from engaging in any picketing to gain recognition and bargain for a unit of guards. See General Service Employees Union Local 73 (Certain Teed Corp.), 240 NLRB 462 (1979), and cases cited in his dissent therein.

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer operates a shopping mall in the city of White Plains, New York, called the Galleria, in which approximately 150 retail establishments of various kinds are situated on 4 levels. The mall is open for shopping 6 days a week from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. and on Sunday from noon to 5 p.m. Among the tenants from whom the Employer annually derives gross revenues in excess of $100,000 is a large department store known as Abraham and Strauss from whom revenues are derived in excess of $25,000 annually. Abraham and Strauss in turn has revenues in excess of $500,000 annually, and has goods and materials delivered to its New York State locations from outside said State in excess of $50,000 annually. The answer, as noted, does not deny and I now find that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The mall opened for shopping to the public on August 1, 1980, but appears to have had many employees working prior to that date who became covered by a collective-bargaining agreement entered into between the Employer and the Union on said date.[1] In said agreement the Union was recognized as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the approximately 80 "Housekeeping Employees" at the mall engaged in custodial and cleanup work. Specifically excluded from the unit were, among others, "all security employees." The agreement contains union-security and dues-checkoff clauses which have been applied to the unit employees. In the performance of their housekeeping duties the employees wear various uniforms depending upon their particular job. Thus, those who were engaged primarily in cleaning functions wear a brown colored outfit while those working in the food service areas wear red and white pinstripe jackets. The only equipment used by them are those incidental to and required by their assignments, e.g., mops, brooms, cleaning paraphenalia, etc. Respondent's agent servicing the agreement is one Joan Kelly who has met on occasion with the members of the Employer's managerial staff to discuss various issues arising thereunder.

In addition to a cleaning service, the Employer also provides security and protective services at the mall. To accomplish this objective it employs a security force of 25 persons both full and part time, working three shifts a day, 7 days a week, thus furnishing 24-hour coverage. These 25 employees are directed by 5 sergeants, 2 lieutenants, and 1 captain. They all wear military type uniforms and a police type hat with the Employer's logo pin on the front. The uniform, which consists of a brown shirt and slacks, has on the arm of the shirt the Employer's logo as well as a security patch, and a name tag is worn on the shirt front which shows name and rank. In addition they wear shields with an identifying number and rank as well as the words "Galleria Security." The uniforms also reflect the rank of the wearer by the usual military emblems for sergeants, lieutenants, and captains. All the security personnel carry flashlights approximately 18 inches, which also can be used as a defensive weapon, two-way radios, and handcuffs.

Captain Robert Jackson, a former New York City police officer, testified in great detail concerning the duties and functions of the security force which is under his overall supervision. All the security employees receive training from the city of White Plains police department in matters such as the applicability of state laws pertaining to shoplifting, criminal trespassing, harassment and assault, first aid, self-defense, and how to detain and arrest a criminal suspect. When the mall is closed to the public, security personnel patrol the grounds to guard against unauthorized entry and fire hazards. Any intruder is placed under arrest and a call is made to the White Plains police department. If they have reason to believe there is a suspicious situation, such as unlocked doors to a store, they notify either the police or the owner of the store and guard the area until such authorities arrive. When the mall is open for normal business, they are concerned with insuring the safety of customers and security generally within the mall and its stores. Again, they patrol the grounds to observe for any suspicious or illegal activity such as shoplifting or disorderly conduct. If they apprehend a shoplifter they place that person under arrest by escorting the individual to the security office within the mall and call for the police. When required, they engage in surveillance of a store in order to identify and apprehend shoplifters. They control crowds and unruly individuals, and they apply first aid in the case of an accident and place a call for appropriate medical assistance. They will issue notices to disruptive or disorderly individuals prohibiting them from reentering the mall under penalty of arrest for criminal trespass. In the performance of their duties they are required to fill out written reports in detail describing any arrests they make, illegal activity they observe, or accidents they attend to.

No other employees of the Employer perform any of the duties delineated above and most of the tenants in the mall depend for their security on the services funished by the Employer as performed by the security force. It was estimated by Jackson that perhaps no more than six of the merchants in the mall employ individuals in a security or guard capacity, and then only during business hours. However, even in those instances the Employer's security force renders assistance as a regular practice, and, when the mall is closed, it is the Employer's security force alone that guards against breaking and entering and against fire hazards.

On September 5, Henry F. Chartier, Respondent's president, wrote to the Employer's manager of the mall, Larry Brown, stating that the Union had been designated by the Employer's "security guards" as their "collective-bargaining agent" and for that reason he was scheduling

September 11 for Brown to meet with him to discuss an "agreement covering wages, hours, working conditions and benefits for such employees." At or about the same time, a business agent of Respondent, Joseph DiBucci, had a few telephone conversations with Brown in which DiBucci stated that a majority of the security guards had designated Respondent as their collective-bargaining representative and accordingly Respondent was requesting that the Employer sign a collective-bargaining agreement.

On September 30, Brown replied by letter to Chartier that on advice of counsel the Employer would not recognize Respondent as the bargaining agent for the security guards. On October 17, Brown had a telephone conversation with Raymond McDonough, Respondent's vice president, in which the latter again stated that Respondent represented a majority of the guards and that it would be "mutually beneficial" if they could sit down and work out an agreement. According to Brown, when he replied that the Employer would not recognize Respondent in a guard unit, McDonough stated, "[H]ow many trucks, truck drivers do you think will cross over and make deliveries at the Galleria? How many construction workers do you think will cross over and work in those stores?"

On Monday, October 20, at approximately 8 a.m. Respondent began picketing on the perimeter of the mall. Approximately 15 to 20 pickets including security employees, patrolled at the public entrances with picket signs bearing Respondent's name and a legend stating that the employees were on strike. The picketing continued on almost a 24-hour basis until it was enjoined by a temporary restraining order issued by a Federal district court pursuant to Section 10(l) of the Act on October 24, 1980. During the course of that picketing on or about October 23, Kelly, who was present during the picketing, told Brown that the picketing would cease if a contract were signed. In her district court testimony, Kelly swore that the purpose of the picketing was to secure recognition of the guards. One of the Employer's guards who participated in the picketing activity, Donna Varian, told Captain Jackson at the picket line, that the employees were picketing in order to have Respondent represent them. On October 22, Respondent filed a petition[2] in the National Labor Relations Board's Region 2 office in Case 2-RC-18864, in which, inter alia, it requested an election in a unit consisting of "customer security personnel" excluding all others. The petition further referred to the fact that a request for recognition had been made on September 5. On October 23, the petition was dismissed by the Regional Director for the stated reason that Respondent admitted to membership employees other than guards, that the unit consisted of guards as defined by Section 9(b)(3) of the Act and consequently Respondent could not be certified pursuant to the provisions of Section 9(b)(3) of the Act. On January 12, 1981, the Board issued a "Ruling on Administrative Action" in which the Board considered the Union's request for review of that dismissal and "concluded that the allegations are insufficient to warrant reversal." The Board therefore affirmed the dismissal of the petition.[3]

III. DISCUSSION AND FINDINGS

Section 8(b)7(C), inter alia, prohibits a labor organization from picketing for a recognitional or organizational objective beyond a reasonable period of time not to exceed 30 days. However, such picketing is not proscribed if within that reasonable time the labor organization has filed a petition pursuant to Section 9(c) of the Act. In the instant case, the Union did file such a petition in which it claimed that a substantial number of employees in the proposed unit wished to be represented by it for purposes of collective-bargaining and that it desired to be certified as such representative, thereby seeking to avoid any restraint on its picketing. But Section 9(b)(3) of the Act provides, in pertinent part, that "no labor organization shall be certified as the representative of employees in a bargaining unit of guards if such organization admits to membership, or is affiliated directly or indirectly with an organization which admits to membership, employees other than guards." Harmonizing Sections 8(b)(7)(C) and 9(b)(3) of the Act the Board, with court approval, held in General Service Employees Union Local No. 73, affiliated with Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO (A-1 Security Co.), 224 NLRB 434 (1976) (see fn. 9 and cases cited therein), enfd. 578 F.2d 361 (D.C. Cir. 1978), that a union which is disqualified from certification because of the applicability of Section 9(b)(3) may not avail itself of the statutory right granted other labor organizations to engage in recognitional picketing. Such picketing by a disqualified union, or even a threat to picket, constitutes a violation of Section 8(b)(7)(C). Under these circumstances, it is reasoned that any period of picketing by a union which carries the 9(b)(3) disqualification would be unreasonable because no valid petition could be filed. Accord: General Service Employees Union Local No. 73, affiliated with Service Employees International Union AFL-CIO (Active Detective Agency), 240 NLRB 462 (1979). The General Counsel and the Charging Party assert that the facts and circumstances of the case at bar place Respondent's picketing and threats thereof squarely within the rationale of the aforesaid holdings. I agree.

In the first place, notwithstanding the Union's denial that it admits to membership employees other than guards, the evidence clearly and unmistakably establishes otherwise.[4] Guards are defined by Section 9(b)(3) of the [3] This ruling was brought to my attention in the Charging Party's brief.

[4] The Board action upholding the dismissal of the Union's petition in Case 2-RC-8864, including the underlying reasons for the Regional Director's finding that Sec. 9(b)(3) disqualified the Union from obtaining a certification for the unit of guards requested, is binding on me. Drivers, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers, Local Union No. 71, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Wells Fargo Armored Service Corporation), 221 NLRB 1240, 1242 (1975). However, because the General Counsel litigated these issues fully and is not seeking to rely solely on the previously made administrative findings, it is only appropriate that I address the issues on the basis of the record evidence.

Act as individuals employed "to enforce against employees and other persons rules to protect property of the Employer or to protect the safety of persons on the Employer's premises." Quite apart from whether the Union by virtue of its ties to its parent international organization is directly or indirectly affiliated with an organization which admits to membership employees other than guards, and quite apart from whether the Union by virtue of its represenative status elsewhere itself admits to membership employees other than guards (matters the General Counsel would have hoped to prove had Respondent appeared and complied with certain subpenas), the evidence is overwhelming that with respect to the very Employer herein the Union represents employees other than guards and admits such persons to membership. The collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the Employer as applied to the housekeeping unit is conclusive proof on this issue. The testimony establishes without any doubt whatsoever that there are approximately 80 employees within this unit whose duties consist solely of the performance of custodial and janitorial chores such as cleaning floors, polishing glass and chrome, and cleaning tables in food areas, and that they use standard cleaning equipment and materials. In no sense can they be considered guards and it is clear they are not. Further, not only does Respondent represent these employees but it compels their membership pursuant to the union-security and checkoff provisions in the collective-bargaining agreement.

The second question to be determined is whether or not the Respondent was seeking to represent a unit of guards. Although the Union's answer admits that it was picketing the Employer to force it to recognize and bargain with it as the representative of the Employer's guards and security officers, the answer also somewhat inconsistently denies that the Employer employed individuals as guards and security officers. In view of this, I place no reliance on Respondent's answer in finding that it demanded to be recognized as the bargaining agent for the Employer's guards as that term is defined by the Act. The evidence leaves no doubt that the "security personnel" encompassed by the Union's petition are statutory guards. The uniforms they wear and the equipment they carry are typical of such employees and aid them in performing their duties which includes apprehending shoplifters and other law violators. They protect the security of merchandise against theft from the stores in the mall, and they guard and protect the premises of the mall itself. They perform safety functions by administering first aid, attending to the injured, and securing competent medical help when needed. Their training by the White Plains police department is required so that they may fulfill effectively the function of arresting wrongdoers and barring such persons from the premises of the mall and they are required to have a knowledge of applicable criminal laws to carry out these protective functions. They also patrol the mall's premises to guard against fire as well as theft. Thus, they are trained to and function in the capacity of protecting the safety of persons and the safeguarding of property by responsibly observing and reporting infractions of the rules and laws and by physically securing property and apprehending those who violate such rules and laws. Such individuals long have been recognized as guards within the meaning of Section 9(b)(3) even where, as here, certain of the protective duties they perform are designed to secure and safeguard not only their employer's property, i.e., the premises of the mall proper, but also the property of their employer's customers such as the merchandise in the stores. Purolator Courier Corp., 254 NLRB 599 (1981), and cases cited therein; The Wackenhut Corporation, 196 NLRB 278 (1972); see, generally, Drivers, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers Local No. 71, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America v. N.L.R.B., 553 F.2d 1368, 1372, 1373 (D.C. Cir. 1977).

It is clear therefore and I find that Respondent admits to membership employees other than guards, that it was seeking recognition for a unit of guards, and that pursuant to Section 9(b)(3) of the Act it could not file a valid petition and could not be certified in such unit. Consequently, if the Union picketed or threatened to picket for such recognitional objective the violation would be complete.

The Union admits that it has engaged in picketing for recognition of the individuals found here to be guards and no more need be said on that score. Furthermore, the record evidence demonstrates conclusively that Respondent's picketing was for the prohibited recognitional objective. Thus, the picketing on October 20 closely followed numerous demands for recognition starting in early September, a petition filed on October 22 and dismissed on October 23, Respondent's agent, Kelly, and one of the picketing guards conceded that the picketing was to obtain recognition and Kelly also told the Employer's representative, Brown, during the course of the picketing, that such activity would cease if a collective-bargaining agreement would be negotiated. In addition, Union Agent McDonough told Brown, during the course of a prepicketing conversation in which recognition was requested that "how many trucks, truckdrivers do you think will cross over and make deliveries at the Galleria? How many construction workers do you think will cross over and work in those stores?" These statements in labor parlance are susceptible to no other interpretation than that a picket line would be established which in fact is what occured. As such they constitute a threat to picket for recognition as alleged in the complaint.

Under the circumstance described above, Respondent's picketing and threat thereof constitute clear violations of Section 8(b)(7)(C), for as the court stated in Drivers, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers, Local Union No. 71, etc. [Wells Fargo Armored Service Corporation], 553 F.2d 1368 at 1377 (1977), enfg. 221 NLRB 1240 (1975). "To tolerate continued picketing after dismissal of the Union's petition would bestow on petitioner greater rights than are afforded qualifying unions, and would, in particular clothe the Union with a coercive power under circumstances in which Congress clearly did not intend it to exist."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS JENKINS AND HUNTER

On July 9, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Robert W. Leiner issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, a motion to reopen the record, and a motion to dismiss.[1]

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Cote Bros. Bakery, Inc., Manchester, New Hampshire, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns. shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

WE WILL NOT threaten to discharge employees who engaged in a lawful strike by telling them that they are "through" if they continue to engage in the strike.

WE WILL NOT insist, to the point of bargaining impasse, on nonmandatory subjects of bargaining, including an amnesty for all our employees who pass through or work behind the Union's picket line.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, upon request, bargain collectively in good faith with Local 348, Bakery, Confectionery and Tobacco Workers International Union of America, AFL-CIO, in the below-described unit with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and embody any understanding reached in a signed agreement:

> Bakery Production Department, Porters, Plant Maintenance and Shipping Departments, excluding Executives, office and clerical employees, guards, professional employees, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL, upon their unconditional offer to return to work, reinstate the strikers to their old jobs, dismissing, if necessary, any replacements hired in their place, except where such replacements occurred before June 24, 1980, and make them whole for any loss of earnings that they may incur, with interest. Striking employees who were premanently replaced or whose jobs were abolished before June 24, 1980, shall be offered jobs when and if the pre-

[1] Respondent moves to reopen the record to adduce evidence that its assets have been foreclosed and are being liquidated, and that an involuntary bankruptcy petition has been filed against the Company. Inasmuch as this evidence if established would not in any way affect the findings and result herein, see Sec. 102.48(d)(1) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, and inasmuch as such matters are more appropriately handled at the compliance stage of this proceeding, we decline to grant Respondent's motion. For the reasons discussed by the Administrative Law Judge in fn. 10 of his Decision, we also deny Respondent's motion to dismiss.

[2] Respondent has implicitly excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

In agreeing with the Administrative Law Judge that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act, we find it unnecessary to pass upon the alternative theory (which he characterized as "legally unnecessary" to decide) which he discussed in pars. 9 and 10 of the section of his Decision entitled "Discussion and conclusions" and in the section entitled "The Strike as of June 24, 1980."

We note that the Administrative Law Judge inadvertently miscited Nelson Filter, a Division of Nelson Industries, Inc. The correct citation is 255 NLRB 1080 (1981).

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT W. LEINER, Administrative Law Judge: The charge in Case 1-CA-17666 was filed and served on July 15, 1980, by Local 348, Bakery, Confectionery and Tobacco Workers International Union of America, AFL-CIO, herein called the Union or Local 348, upon Cote Bros. Bakery, Inc., herein called Respondent. The charge in Case 1-CA-17762 was filed and served by the Union on August 19, 1980, on Respondent. The Regional Director for Region 1 of the National Labor Relations Board, herein called the Board, acting for and on behalf of the Board's General Counsel, issued a complaint and notice of hearing on October 15, 1980. Pursuant to the second charge herein, the aforesaid Regional Director, on January 25, 1981, issued an order consolidating cases and amended complaint and notice of hearing. Respondent filed timely answers to both the original and the amended complaint on October 23, 1980, and January 15, 1981, respectively. The consolidated amended complaint, herein referred to as the complaint, alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, by virtue of various alleged threats to employees on June 10 and 11, 1980, after the commencement of a strike and by virtue of a refusal to bargain by Respondent as shown by certain acts it committed during collective-bargaining negotiations occurring on June 24, 1980. The complaint, as modified at the hearing, also alleges that the strike, which commenced on or about June 10, 1980, was converted into an unfair labor practice strike on or about June 24, 1980. In its answers Respondent admits various allegations of the complaint but denies the commission of any unfair labor practices.

Pursuant to notice, a hearing was held on the issues raised by the pleadings in Boston, Massachusetts, on May 13 and 14, 1981. After close of receipt of the evidence, the parties waived oral argument and thereafter filed timely briefs which have been duly considered.

Upon the entire record in this case, including the briefs, and upon my observation of the witnesses as they testified, I hereby make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that, at all material times, Respondent, a New Hampshire corporation, maintained its office and principal place of business at 87 Elm Street, Manchester, New Hampshire, where it has been, and is now, engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of bread and rolls, annually shipping products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of New Hampshire, and annually receiving products valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of New Hampshire. Respondent, at all material times, has been, and is, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Local 348, Bakery, Confectionery and Tobacco Workers International Union of America, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

At the hearing, the General Counsel and Respondent substantially amended their respective pleadings: The General Counsel withdrew various allegations of independent violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Respondent admitted that it and the Union were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement effective from May 4, 1977, through May 7, 1979, encompassing the following unit:

> Bakery Production Department, Porters, Plant Maintenance and Shipping Departments, excluding Executives, office and clerical employees, guards, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Respondent, in addition, also admitted that the above unit is one appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act, and that since on or about 1951 the Union has been the designated exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the above unit[1] and had been recognized as such by Respondent for purposes of Section 9(b) of the Act until on or about June 30, 1980.

The parties agree that the Union engaged in an economic strike commencing at or about noon, June 10, 1980, but the General Counsel alleges, and Respondent denies, that the strike became an unfair labor practice strike on June 24, 1980. There is no dispute that the strike continued through the time of the hearing herein.

It is admitted by the General Counsel that Cote Bros. Bakery has been in substantial financial difficulty at least since 1979. At all material times from the end of 1979 until June 1980, Respondent maintained an $800,000 debt to the Indian Head Bank, Nashua, New Hampshire, herein called the Bank. By June 1980, Respondent had defaulted on repaying this loan and was insolvent in excess of $323,000. Furthermore, for at least 6 months prior to June 1980, Respondent had defaulted on its obligation to pay contributions to the Union's pension fund under an expired collective-bargaining agreement (G.C. Exh. 2; expired May 7, 1979), which agreement had been orally extended by the parties subsequent to its expiration. Lastly, Respondent had been in default of paying the interest on its bank debt for at least that same 6-month period. Negotiations regarding a new collective-bargaining agreement occurred from time to time since expiration of the old agreement.

[1] The actual collective-bargaining representative prior to June 1, 1979, was another local of the same International. On June 1, 1979, that local was merged into Local 348.

By April 1979, the Bank had employed a financial consultant, Charles R. Hefford, to review and evaluate Respondent's financial condition and prospects. In a report to the Bank (not presented at this hearing), Hefford advised the Bank that, notwithstanding Respondent's defaults, it need not at that time take over Respondent's assets (apparently pursuant to its right as a creditor) and that Respondent could continue as a viable business provided various internal changes and economies were instituted. Thereafter, Hefford became a financial consultant to Respondent.[2]

Sometime no later than May 1980, in bargaining with Respondent, the Union demanded an economic package which consisted of a 92-1/2-cent-per-hour increase. The Bank authorized Respondent to offer no higher than a total of 30 cents per hour: 17-1/2 cents per hour for maintenance of existing benefits; and a 12-1/2-cent-per-hour wage increase. Respondent made this cnunteroffer in May 1980.

In support of its continued claim of financial inability to pay higher wages, it is undisputed that as early as October 1979 Respondent offered, and the Union agreed, to have the Union inspect its books and records. The Union did so on or about October 3, 1979. I further find that, at all material times thereafter, Respondent has offered to prove its continued financial inability to pay greater economic increases.

On June 10, 1980, the parties held a collective-bargaining session in which the Union demanded 92-1/2 cents per hour as a total economic package. Respondent offered 30 cents per hour and offered to prove, again, its inability to make a more fruitful economic offer. The Union nevertheless insisted on its demand of 92-1/2 cents per hour and engaged in an economic strike commencing at or about noon on that day. At noon, a picket line was authorized by the Union's officials, including Kenneth McLellan, an International vice president of the Union.

At the start of the June 10 strike, Bruce Ullrich, general manager of Respondent, telephoned Louis Murray, a senior vice president and chief loan officer of the Bank, for help and counsel. He told Murray that the Union apparently did not believe Respondent's poor financial position and that perhaps Murray and the Bank could convince the Union that Respondent was unable to pay more.

Within a half hour, Murray, together with the Bank's attorney and another bank official, arrived at Respondent's bakery, met with Ullrich and asked Ullrich what they could do. They decided that the Bank, as a "neutral third party," should speak to the Union's officials in the absence of Ullrich (or any other of Respondent's supervisors) and denonstrate to them Respondent's financial difficulties. Murray also credibly testified that, at that time, he considered it to be a prudent act, in protecting the Bank's interest, to activate the legal machinery to take over Respondent's assets but, pursuant to a telephone call from Respondent's attorney, he acceded to the request not to do so for at least 1 day.

Louis Murray testified that he agreed with his attorney (Horton) and the other bank official (O'Brian) that there would be no negotiations by the Bank with any union people and no involvement in Respondent's union affairs. Their only function was to demonstrate Respondent's unhappy financial position to the Union. Thus, at their request, Ullrich went to the picket line and returned with several union business agents and officers, including McLellan and Local 348 Business Manager David Murray, as well as several picketing employees. Ullrich left them. With the union business agents as well as the striking employees standing in Respondent's loading area, a conversation ensued between the parties. Local 348 Business Manager David Murray testified that Bank Vice President Louis Murray said that if a strike continued for 2 days Respondent would "fold." He said that Bank Official O'Brian added that the Bank had given Respondent the 30-cent-per-hour economic package and, if the Union did not believe Respondent's financial condition, the Union could inspect the books. David Murray said that he answered that the Union knew of Respondent's financial problems; the Union had given Respondent a 1-year extension without increases and believed that they already had an agreement for a zero increase for the first year of a new contract and 75 cents per hour for the second year. O'Brian then allegedly answered that the Bank had told Respondent that it could offer only 30 cents per hour and was telling the Union the same thing. The Union said that the strike would continue.

Frank Volpe, a Local 348 business agent, testified that the bank officials not only said that Respondent would have greater financial problems if the strike continued, but the Bank would foreclose its loans to Respondent and sell Respondent's equipment and everybody would lose their jobs.

Louis Murray, who on June 10 caused O'Brian, to serve Respondent with a demand for payment of the defaulted loan, testified that he told the union officials and the employees that the Bank was there not to negotiate or get involved between the parties but merely as an independent third party; that the Bank's interest concerned whether to foreclose its loan and liquidate Respondent's business; that Respondent was $361,000 into insolvency; that "any slowdown of revenue coming in could have a fatal impact on the Company"; and that the Union should "draw its own conclusions as to what would happen with the continuation of the strike." He denied telling them that a continuation of the strike would force Respondent to close or even mentioning 30 cents per hour or anything with regard to negotiations. He testified that he told the employees and union officials only that he was there as a third party giving the Bank's point of view with regard to Respondent's financial condition.

B. Louis Murray's Statements as Alleged Violations of Section 8(a)(1)

The complaint alleges that Respondent, by the Bank's officials as its agents, told the employees that the Bank would foreclose and the employees would lose their jobs if the employees continued to strike. Respondent contests this agency status, but no finding on the point is necessary since I dispose of the Bank's action on the merits.[3] The General Counsel did not call McLellan to corroborate the testimony of Volpe and David Murray. Similarly, Respondent called neither its attorney (Horton) nor its agent (O'Brian) to substantiate and corroborate the testimony of Louis Murray.

[2] There is no suggestion that he remained an agent of the bank.

I resolve the testimonial conflict between the Bank and the union officials as follows. I conclude that Louis Murray did tell the assembled union officers and employees that continuing the strike would cause Respondent such loss of revenue as to cause it to fold, and that the Bank would foreclose the loan, and sell the equipment and everybody would lose their jobs if the strike continued. That is the meaning of his "draw [your] own conclusions remark." I also conclude that Louis Murray's and the other bank officials' statements to the union officials and employees, that a continued strike meant such a loss of revenue as to necessarily cause the Bank to foreclose, Respondent to go out of business, and the employees to lose their jobs, in the presence of the objective financial data known to the Union for at least 6 months, were insulated from any coercive effect as an unlawful "threat" within the meaning of the Act. Thus, such statements, in conjunction with Louis Murray's unchallenged testimony that, in the Bank's interest, it should have immediately taken over and liquidated Respondent's assets and that it contemporaneously presented a demand to Respondent for payment of its defaulted loan (as a legal preliminary to taking over Respondent's assets), were based on clear and open economic data which demonstrated a reasonable belief on the Bank's part that Respondent could not continue in business suffering the anticipated economic losses due to the strike. This is legally far different from an attempt, without objective, supporting economic data, by an employer to coerce employees into giving up their right to strike by a threat to go out of business. The Supreme Court recognized this in N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc., 395 U.S. 575, 618 (1969). Under Gissel, I conclude that Louis Murray's statements concerning Respondent's going out of business ("draw [your] own conclusions") in the face of a loss of revenue due to the strike was a "reasonable prediction based on available facts." Gissel, supra at 618. Certainly, there is no evidence of the Bank's insincerity in making these predictions. I therefore recommend that paragraph 8(d), which alleges an independent violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by virtue of the bank officials' June 10 statements to Respondent's striking employees of a threat to go out of business, be dismissed.

C. Other Alleged 8(a)(1) Violations

According to the testimony of Scott Tuthill, an employee engaged in the June 10 strike, he met Bruce Ullrich in the bakery parking lot in the afternoon on June 10 while the strike was in progress. He testified that Ullrich approached him and told him that he was trying to get a shift together for that night to continue to work; that if Tuthill wanted to come to work he could; but that if the strike continued, the plant would close permanently. Ullrich denied having any such conversation with Tuthill. I credit Tuthill and discredit Ullrich. I do so on the basis of the specificity of Tuthill's recollection and on the demeanor of the witnesses. I conclude, nevertheless, that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by telling Tuthill, a striking employee, that Respondent would close its plant permanently if the employees continued to strike. I note that, although economic elements were mentioned by Ullrich to Tuthill, the statement was insulated by the then existing facts, above stated. I recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

The only remaining alleged violation of Section 8(a)(1) is in paragraph 8(b) and involves Respondent's vice president, Colette Cote, and a telephone conversation she had with striking employee John Shea in the evening on June 11, 1980. According to Shea, Cote telephoned him at his home and asked him to return to work and he replied that he would not do so without the Union's approval. To this, Shea testified, Colette Cote said that if he did not return that day, "You're through."

Cote could not recall any particular conversation with John Shea, although she testified that she telephoned 30 of the 60 striking employees in order to have them return to work because, as she told them, the Company had decided to operate and was trying to get a shift together. Cote testified that she told all 30 employees whom she telephoned that Respondent was merely trying to start a production line and asked them to return. While she could not recall what Shea answered, she denied telling him, or any other employee, that they were "through" if they did not return to work.

On the basis of his demeanor and the specificity of his testimony, together with the particular lack of recollection of Cote regarding her conversation with him, I credit Shea and conclude that, as alleged, Cote told him that, if he did not return to work that day, he was "through"; and that such statement was a threat of discharge uttered to a striker in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. This is far different from an objective prognostication of going out of business.

D. The Alleged 8(a)(5) Violations

1. The collective-bargaining session of June 17, 1980

Following the June 10 bargaining session which resulted in the strike of that day, the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service called a further meeting for June 17, 1980. The Union's witnesses, particularly David Murray and Frank Volpe, testified that at Respondent's attorney's (Bennett) request the Union's full committee of employees and union agents selected and worked principally through a subcommittee consisting of Volpe, David Murray, and McLellan (succeeded by Joseph Thibodeau at meetings after June 17). The testimony is in dispute as to whether at this June 17 collective-bargaining session the parties resolved the question of the Union's acceptance of Respondent's outstanding offer of a 30-cent-per-hour economic package. Contrary to the testimony of Respondent's witnesses Ullrich and Hefford, I credit the particular testimony of Volpe, who testified that the union subcommittee, at that bargaining session, agreed to present the 30-cent-per-hour package to the full committee, that the full committee ultimately agreed to recommend the 30-cent-per-hour package to the membership, and that the subcommittee so notified Respondent.

[3] Were a finding necessary, I would conclude that Respondent used the bank officials to persuade the Union of Respondent's insolvency and the economic consequences of a continued strike. Within the scope of such activities, they were Respondent's agents.

Further, I conclude, while the ultimate question of whether the subcommittee told Respondent that the Union was going to recommend to the membership the 30-cent-per-hour economic package is not dispositive and while this is not an "acceptance" of Respondent's offer, I also make the subsidiary finding that at the beginning of the meeting (after the Union acknowledged that it knew that Respondent was in deep financial trouble) Respondent initially inquired whether the Union was prepared to submit Respondent's offer to its membership with an affirmative recommendation. While the Union at first said that it would submit the recommendation without comment, it then agreed to meet with the full committee on the matter and submit it to them. It was after this caucusing that the subcommittee returned and, as above noted, told Respondent that the Union would recommend the 30-cent-per-hour package to the membership. I also find that it was Union Vice President McLellan who, before caucusing with the full committee, told Respondent that the Union would submit the 30-cent-per-hour wage package "without recommendation." I conclude that after caucusing the Union notified Respondent that it was prepared to recommend the 30-cent-per-hour economic package to the membership for a vote, and that the vote, in accordance with Respondent's request, would be by secret ballot.

At the time of this June 17 meeting, the strike was in progress for 1 week. During the meeting, and before the Union's caucus to consider acceptance of the economic package, Ullrich told the Union of a number of incidences of strike misconduct affecting some (about 17) employees who had crossed the picket line and worked for Respondent during that week. Ullrich read off a list of allegations of attempted rape, scratching and painting cars, and threats to employees who crossed the picket line. McLellan denied knowledge of the incidents but added that he would pass the word that the members should abstain from violence.

I further find that, after the subcommittee returned and advised Respondent that the Union committee would recommend the 30-cent-per-hour economic package, Respondent (Bennett) said "great" but that the parties still had to resolve the problem of protecting the working employees against any threats or reprisals from the returned strikers. I find, in accordance with Ullrich's testimony, that Bennett and Ullrich told the Union that Respondent sought to protect employees who crossed the picket line and any "new hires." Ullrich and Bennett told the Union of Respondent's concern with the Union's anticipated retaliation against its members who crossed the Union's picket line. David Murray recalled that, when Respondent, through Ullrich and Bennett, demanded a contract provision that there be no reprisals against the employees who crossed the picket line, McLellan said that what Respondent was asking for was against the International constitution; that members had a right to bring charges against other members; and that, in view of the fact that he thought that there was an existing agreement, that Respondent had "doublecrossed" the Union. McLellan recalled that, in addition, he told Bennett that while the Union could not agree to a provision against reprisals against members who crossed the picket line because the members had a right to file charges under the union constitution, the union officers had no interest in taking reprisals against such members. Volpe's testimony corroborates David Murray's and McLellan's credited testimony.

Charles R. Hefford, present at the meeting as Respondent's financial consultant, credibly recalled that, when the Union stated that it could not bind the membership from making charges against the members who crossed the picket line, but that the officers had no interest in taking retaliation, Bennett or Ullrich said that such an assurance from the Union was not sufficient and that Respondent wanted an assurance against retribution or retaliation by the membership. He recalled Ullrich saying that the union officers' assurance, as it stood, was not good enough; and that Respondent needed an agreement against retaliation from any quarter against the employees who passed through the picket line since they were the older, experienced employees needed by Respondent to operate. He recalls that Respondent called them its "key" people. Ullrich recalled that McLellan said he hoped Respondent was not trying to tell him how to run "his Union."

I credit Hefford's testimony that at that point McLellan said that, since there could be no agreement with regard to the issue of retribution or retaliation against members who had crossed the picket line, he would not present Respondent's 30-cent-per-hour economic offer to the membership. At that point, after McLellan said that the members had a constitutional right under the International constitution to file charges against members who crossed the picket line, Bennett asked for a copy of the constitution to see what the members' rights were. McLellan said that he did not have a copy of the constitution with him but would provide Bennett with a copy thereafter, and suggested that Bennett, as a lawyer, might find a way around this problem. A copy of the constitution was subsequently served on Bennett.

Volpe credibly testified, and Ullirch's and Hefford's testimony supports the conclusion, that this June 17 meeting broke up after Bennett said that Respondent could not allow the employees who crossed the picket line to have problems and would have to have an agreement that these "key people" would not be subject to any union retribution either by having them fired by the Union through loss of union membership or through the imposition of heavy union fines which might cause them to quit their employment.

2. The collective-bargaining session of June 24, 1980

The Federal Mediation and Concilation Service called a meeting on June 24. The meeting opened with the mediator asking the Union to explain its International constitution and the members' right to file charges against members who crossed the union picket line.

Attorney for Respondent (Bennett) then stated that since he had been provided with the copy of the union constitution between the two meetings, and the Union had rejected a premeeting suggestion that the Union exact a token $25 fine on each member who had crossed through the picket line, the way around the problem of union retaliation was that the Union agree to an "agency shop." Bennett said that an agency shop would require merely the payment of union dues and fees without requiring union membership and that the union members who had crossed the picket line could neither be heavily fined nor retaliated against. This would permit their continued employment as key people by Respondent. The Union refused to agree to the offer. Thereafter, Bennett suggested, and the Union rejected, an agreement for an initial 1-year agency shop to be followed by the reinstitution of a union-shop provision in the second year of a 2-year contract. The Union told Respondent that it would not agree to any form of agency shop.

David Murray recalled that at that point Attorney Bennett asked whether the Union could discharge the employees who crossed the picket line and the Union responded that it could not and even gave reasons (not disclosed in this record either by direct examination or cross-examination) why it could not cause a discharge of such employees. David Murray testified that after the Union again said that the union officials would not retaliate, and would even recommend to its members that they take no reprisals but could not guarantee that, Bennett said that he agreed that the Union had done everything possible and that he understood and approved of the Union's action. I do not credit David Murray's further testimony that Bennett then said that the parties had "an agreement." I do, however, credit Volpe's testimony that at the June 24 meeting the Union told Respondent that, in the intervening week since the June 17 meeting, the union committee had met with the employee-members and that the members would not cause problems with reprisals against members who had crossed the picket line. This substantially corroborates David Murray's testimony that at one point Bennett said that he agreed that the Union had done everything possible and that he understood and approved of the Union's conduct with regard to gaining as much as possible from the membership with regard to an assurance and agreement against the filing of retaliatory charges by union members against those who crossed the picket line.

According to the General Counsel's witnesses, particularly David Murray, Volpe, and International Union Representative Thibodeau (who on June 24 had replaced McLellan), Bennett then said, after hearing union assurances (there would be no trouble from the union membership in filing charges against members who had crossed the picket line), that in order to help insure the protection of employees who had crossed the picket line from retaliation by individual members Respondent required the right to "pick and choose" from among the returning striking employees since some of the strikers were responsible for alleged acts of violence and intimidation against the members who had crossed the picket line. Thibodeau testified that he could not recall the latter phrase being used: that the Company wanted to pick and choose because it did not want to reinstate those responsible for violence. I do not credit Thibodeau's lack of recollection, and I conclude that such a right was linked with the question of Respondent's desire to pick and choose among employees, rejecting those whom it thought responsible for various acts of intimidation and violence. Thibodeau, in any event, denied asking Bennett why or who he wanted to pick and chose.

Volpe testified that Bennett, after hearing that the Union had met with the unit employees regarding the filing of charges, said that the parties had another problem and that Respondent wanted to pick and choose from among those strikers who returned. Volpe recalled that the Union's response was that it could never agree to that, that the meeting broke up, and that the bargainers returned to the picket line. Volpe could not recall any linkage between the alleged violence and Respondent's desire to pick and choose. As aforesaid, I find that there was a linkage mentioned by Respondent between its desire to pick and choose from among returning strikers and its appraisal of whether the strikers were engaged in acts of violence or intimidation.

3. The June 24 collective-bargaining session according to Respondent's witnesses

Hefford recalled that the Federal mediator, at the conclusion of the June 17 collective-bargaining session, stated that he saw the possibility of progress if the retaliation or "retribution" issue could be addressed. He recalled that the opening of the June 24 session concerned the question of the Company's desire for assurances protecting the employees who crossed the picket line during the strike; and that, after the Union rejected Bennett's suggestions both of an agency shop and of a secondary variation requiring a union shop following 1 year of an agency shop, Bennett said that the Union had also rejected an intermediate position taken during the period between the collective-bargaining sessions (of a $25 fine for members who had crossed the picket line) and that it now seemed to him that the Union actually did want to take retaliation against those members who had crossed the picket line during the strike. Ullrich then added that Respondent was in the business of selling bread "not people."

Hefford and Ullrich denied that any "pick and choose" statement was ever made by Respondent, that Respondent ever expressed the desire to pick and choose from among returning strikers, and that seniority among returning picketers was ever discussed; and both assert that the meeting broke up only after the Union could not give assurances to Respondent against retaliation or retribution against members who had crossed the picket line.[4]

[4] To the extent Respondent asserts (br., p. 4) that at the June 24 session Respondent stated that the issue of union reprisals against nonstriking employees who returned to work was no longer in issue, such assertion is not supported by the evidence and is rejected. Similarly rejected is Re-

Continued

Ullrich testified that the only statement remotely concerning "picking and choosing" was made at the June 17 meeting when he said that, if Respondent caught any of its employees engaging in violence or intimidation, Respondent would prosecute such employees and they would then have a hard time returning to work for Respondent.

Thus, Hefford and Ullrich denied that any "pick and choose" condition was attached to any agreement. Rather, Ullrich and Hefford testified that the June 24 collective-bargaining session broke up because and after Bennett asserted that the Union evidently desired to take retaliation against the members who had passed through the picket line and Ullrich said that Respondent sold bread and not people. They thus deny not only that there was a "pick and choose" condition attached by them after reaching an agreement on union retaliation (as the General Counsel's witnesses testified), but also that there was any agreement on retaliation. They testified that the June 24 session broke up only because of the Union's refusal to give assurances from its members that there would be no retaliation against the members who had passed through the picket line and worked during the strike.

4. Discussion and conclusions

The complaint (par. 13) alleges a violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act because Respondent, on or about June 24, 1980, demanded as conditions of agreement that (1) the Union agree not to take reprisals against union members who did not honor the picket line, and (2) Respondent be given power to choose the striking employees who would be allowed to return to work. In addition, the complaint, as amended at the hearing, alleges that the economic strike of June 10 was converted, on June 24, 1980, by Respondent's demand for the imposition of the aforesaid conditions, into an unfair labor practice strike.

At the hearing the parties appeared to take the position that in order to resolve the above issues it was necessary to first decide whether the parties had reached an agreement on an economic package, and, if so, whether such an agreement established a basis for violation of the Act if the only remaining elements at issue were the questions of a union guarantee against reprisals and alleged demand by Respondent of a right to pick and choose from among returning striking employees. The Board precedents fail to suggest that an agreement on some or all economic or other elements is necessary in order to establish an 8(a)(5) violation.

The instant case is not concerned with surface bargaining, unlawful action to forestall reaching an agreement, or alleged overall bad-faith bargaining in violation of Section 8(a)(5). Rather, it is concerned with the narrow problem of whether Respondent unlawfully insisted to "impasse" on matters which Sections 8(a)(5) and 8(d) of the Act do not permit to form the basis of an "impasse" and whether such tactic on June 24 converted the June 10 economic strike into an unfair labor practice strike upon Respondent's insistence on such conditions.

Thus, the resolution of the question of whether the parties agreed to Respondent's 30-cent-per-hour economic package or, indeed, whether the Union agreed to submit to its membership the 30-cent-per-hour package with a recommendation for acceptance (as the General Counsel suggests) or with a neutural recommendation (as Respondent argues) is not dispositive. The question to be resolved with regard to Respondent's bargaining stance is solely whether it refused to bargain within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by insisting on either or both of the elements alleged in paragraph 13 of the complaint, as set forth above.

If Respondent's witnesses are to be believed, Respondent's main bargaining issue and problem was its desire for, and demand to receive, assurances from the Union that there would be no retaliation against the Union's members who had passed through its picket line and worked during the strike. These assurances were of two types: (1) assurances with regard to their physical safety and (2) assurances that Respondent would neither levy fines against them nor cause them to lose union membership, nor, in any event, exercise any rights to have them discharged or retaliated against so that the employees would either quit or no longer be able to work for Respondent. Thus, Hefford and Ullrich insisted that Respondent and the Union could not agree on the Union's ability to give sufficient assurances against retaliation against the union members who had worked during the strike and continue to work for Respondent.

Since the Union denied knowledge of and responsibility for the acts of alleged violence and intimidation, and Respondent, apart from physical safety, was most concerned about (1) the filing of charges by union members which might result in fines against key personnel who might then leave Respondent's employ and (2) the power of the Union to cause key personnel to lose union membership and perhaps thereby run afoul of the contract's union-security clause (G.C. Exh. 2, art. I) requiring union membership as a condition of employment, I conclude that what caused impasse here was the Union's inability to satisfy Respondent's desires with regard to protecting its key personnel from retaliatory action by the union membership. Thus, Ullrich testified, with regard to Respondent's demand that the "key personnel" be protected, that on June 24 Attorney Bennett said that the Union's rejection of both the "agency-shop device" and the "small fine device" forced Bennett to affirmatively conclude that the Union did want to take retaliation against the members who had worked behind the picket line. Thus, after Ullrich said that Respondent sold bread and not people, the parties left and there were no further bargaining sessions or meetings.

Respondent's demand as a condition of agreement that the Union, in substance, guarantee by contract provision that its members would not take action or file charges which would result in discipline, including fines, of the members who crossed the picket line and worked (and continue to work) for Respondent, obviously related to matters of internal union affairs. The Board has clearly spondent's contention (br., p. 5) that impasse resulted from Respondent's insistence on a new union-security clause in the contract. Respondent, in any event, appears to admit (br., p. 19) that it insisted on a guarantee against reprisals binding on all union members as a condition of agreement. Alone, impasse on such an issue is unlawful.

held that internal union affairs are not mandatory subjects of bargaining[5] included within the terms, wages, hours, or other terms or conditions of employment. While not illegal subjects of bargaining, they are merely "nonmandatory" subjects of bargaining. Nordstorm, Inc., supra; Fetzer Broadcasting Company, 227 NLRB 1377, 1387 (1977). An employer may not insist that a union accept provisions which intrude on the disciplinary powers over its members expressly reserved to unions by the proviso to Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.[6] Independent Stave Company, 175 NLRB 156, 159 (1969). In Nordstorm, Inc., supra, the Board held that a proposal that employees who crossed the picket line be granted amnesty from union discipline was a nonmandatory subject of bargaining.

Thus, if Respondent's witnesses' version of the basis for disagreement and the breakup of bargaining at the June 24 collective-bargaining session is credited, the parties reached disagreement, and ceased thereafter to bargain, on the Union's refusal to accede to Respondent's demand that the Union agree that there would be no union retribution from its members against the members who had crossed the picket line. Under the above cited cases, Respondent's insistence on such a clause relates to a nonmandatory subject of bargaining, and insistence to impasse, as here, on such a nonmandatory subject of bargaining violates Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.[7] As I have said above, it is immaterial whether the parties had reached agreement on other mandatory subjects of bargaining. Respondent's insistence, as a condition of agreement, upon the Union's agreeing to a nonmandatory subject of bargaining violates Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. I will recommend that Respondent cease bargaining to impasse on this, and any other nonmandatory issue.

It is thus, it seems to me, legally unnecessary for remedial purposes to reach or decide the further question posed by any crediting of the General Counsel's witnesses who testified that on June 24 agreement was reached on the issue of retaliation when Respondent, through Respondent's attorney, Bennett, said that the Union's efforts in having its members not make charges against the members who had passed through the picket line, although not a guarantee, were understood by Bennett and acceptable by him. They also testified that Bennett said that there was a further problem, however, in that Respondent insisted on the right to pick and choose from among the remaining striking employees for the existing jobs in their return to work.

Insistence to impasse on such a right would violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act since many, if not most, of the strikers apparently had not been permanently replaced as of June 24 and were unfair labor practice strikers. While the issue of reinstatement of economic strikers may be a mandatory subject of bargaining (Nordstrom, Inc., supra at 610, fn. 16, citing Pepsi-Cola Bottling Co. of Miami, Inc., 186 NLRB 477 (1970); Midwestern Instruments, Inc., 133 NLRB 1132, 1141 (1961)), here some of the strikers appear to be unfair labor practice strikers. If an agreement to treat unfair labor practice strikers as economic strikers for purposes of reinstatement is of no effect and is in derogation of the strikers' rights and contravenes Board policies (Nordstrom, Inc., supra; Wooster Division of Borg-Warner Corp., 121 NLRB 1492, 1495 (1958)), then an employer's demand to impasse that it be accorded the right unilaterally to decide whom to reinstate from among unfair labor practice strikers would be insisting on a right the Union may not give; i.e., an unlawful condition under N.L.R.B. v. Wooster Division of Borg-Warner Corp., supra. Insistence to impasse on such a demand would violate Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

As above noted, however, I need not reach or decide this issue since the remedy would be the same if agreement were reached on the issue of union retaliation but a new impasse occurred on Respondent's alleged demand of unilateral power to pick and choose among returning strikers.

F. The Strike as of June 24, 1980

As above noted, I regard as immaterial and, in any case, not dispositive the resolution of the question whether the parties had reached agreement on many or, indeed, all other subjects of bargaining on June 24. The issue with regard to the conversion of the admitted June 10 economic strike into an unfair labor practice strike on June 24 is whether unfair labor practices on June 24 precipitated, in whole or in part, the continuation of the strike. Again, it is not a question of whether there were open issues involving mandatory subjects of bargaining which remained unsettled; rather, the issue is whether Respondent's insistence upon nonmandatory (or unlawful) subjects of bargaining, in whole or in part, caused the continuation of the strike. Tufts Brothers, Inc., 235 NLRB 808, 810 (1978). While it might be argued that there was no agreement on the economic package, there is no question that the economic package appeared on its way to resolution and, indeed, would have been submitted to the unit by the union representatives (according to Respondent's witnesses, without the union's recommendation, by a secret-ballot vote, which procedure was satisfactory to Respondent). What caused the breakup of the June 24 collective-bargaining session and the continuation of the strike was Respondent's insistence (on the evidence adduced from its own witnesses) on the Union's agreeing, as a condition to overall agreement, to have its members not seek or engage in any disciplinary acts or charges against the members who worked, and continue to work, for Respondent during the strike and who had passed through the picket line. I have concluded that such insistence was unlawful within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) since Respondent was insisting to impasse on a mere permissible bargaining subject (N.L.R.B. v. Wooster Division of Borg-Warner Corp., supra at 350; Nordstrom, Inc., supra at 609; Independent Stave Co., supra at 159); and I further conclude that Respondent's insistence to impasse on this nonmandatory subject of bargaining was the predominant, if not the entire, cause of the continuation of the 15 strike on and after June 24, 1980. N.L.R.B. v. Laredo Coca Cola Bottling Company, 613 F.2d 1338 (5th Cir. 1980); Latrobe Steel Company, 244 NLRB 528 (1979). Again, I would reach the same conclusion if the General Counsel's witnesses were credited: that the collective-bargaining session of June 24 failed because of Respondent's insistence to impasse on a right to pick and choose among the striking employees (who, after June 24, were unfair labor practice strikers) concerning their return to jobs with Respondent. Nordstrom, Inc., supra at 609, citing Wooster Division of Borg-Warner Corp., supra at 1495. I might note, in passing, that regardless of whether the right to pick and choose from among returning economic strikers is a mandatory subject of bargaining (especially including the method and means by which they are returned to jobs), where the number of jobs available is less than the number of outstanding striking employees (cf. Nelson Filter, a Division of Nelson Industries, Inc., 255 NLRB 131 (1981); United Aircraft Corporation (Pratt and Whitney Division), 192 NLRB 382 (1971)), what respondent here was insisting upon was not an agreement and schedule with regard to picking and choosing and was not bargaining towards such an agreement, but was (to impasse) the unilateral right to do so. Such a position, not bargaining, would from the outset arrogate to Respondent the sole right to pick and choose from among striking employees. Such conduct would be the arrogation to itself of the power concerning a subject (return of striking employees to their jobs) which the Union was vitally involved in. Such conduct, as I have suggested, likewise would have violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act if the issue were actually reached.

[5] Mandatory subjects of bargaining (Nordstorm, Inc., 229 NLRB 601, 609 (1977), citing International Union of Operating Engineers, Local Union No. 12 (Associated General Contractors of America, Inc., etc.), 187 NLRB 430, 432 (1970)) "are those comprised in the phrase 'wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment' as set forth in Section 8(d) of the Act. While the language is broad, parameters have been established, although not quantified. The touchstone is whether . . . the proposed clause sets a term or condition of employment or regulates the relation between the employer and its employees." Cf. First National Maintenance Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 452 U.S. 666 (1981).

[6] The proviso to Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) states: "[T]his paragraph shall not impair the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership therein."

> [G]ood faith does not license the employer to refuse to enter into agreements on the ground that they do not include some proposal which is not a mandatory subject of bargaining . . . . [S]uch conduct is, in substance, a refusal to bargain about the subjects that are within the scope of mandatory bargaining. This does not mean that bargaining is to be confined to the statutory subjects . . . . But it does not follow that, because the company may propose these [nonmandatory] clauses, it can lawfully insist upon them as a condition to any agreement. [Emphasis supplied.]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Cote Bros. Bakery, Inc., is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 348, Bakery, Confectionery and Tobacco Workers International Union of America, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By telling employees engaged in an economic strike, or or about June 10 or 11, 1980, that they were "through" if they did not return to work and abandon the strike, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By insisting to impasse on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining on June 24, 1980, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

5. By unlawfully insisting to impasse, on June 24, 1980, on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining, Respondent thereby and then converted the economic strike, which commenced on June 10, 1980, into an unfair labor practice strike.

6. The above unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

The General Counsel concedes that there is no monetary loss involved in this case. The parties agree that the strike, which originated on June 10, 1980, is still in progress and that the Union and the striking employees, as of the time of the hearing, have failed to offer unconditionally to return to their jobs.

Having found that Respondent is engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, Respondent will be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The remedies herein will relate, inter alia, to the employees engaged in an economic strike from June 10 through June 23, 1980. With regard to the period June 10 through June 23, 1980, the record is unclear concerning how many employees crossed the picket line and returned to work, when and for which jobs permanent replacements were hired, how many jobs remained available for the strikers in the period ending June 23, 1980, and which, if any, jobs were abolished. The determination of such matters is better left to the compliance stage of the proceeding. Marlene Industries Corporation, et al., 255 NLRB 1446 (1981). In any event, the rights of the economic strikers whose jobs were filled by permanent replacements between June 10 and 23 are governed by the Board's rule in The Laidlaw Corporation, 171 NLRB 1366 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 99 (7th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 920 (1970). In restating the Laidlaw rule, in Giddings & Lewis, Inc., 255 NLRB 742 (1981), the Board declared that economic strikers who unconditionally apply for reinstatement are to be reinstated; but, when their positions are filled by permanent replacements, they are entitled to full reinstatement either upon the departure of the permanent replacements or when jobs for which they are otherwise qualified become available (Flatiron Paving Company, d/b/a Flatiron Materials Company, 250 NLRB 554 (1980)), unless they have in the meantime acquired other regular and substantially equivalent employment or the employer can sustain its burden of proof that the failure to offer reinstatement was for legitimate and substantial business reasons. It will therefore be recommended that, upon these economic strikers' or the Union's (in their behalf) making an unconditional offer to return to their old jobs, Respondent offer them their old jobs; but to such strikers whose jobs were permanently filled on or prior to June 23, 1980, their rights to jobs in the bakery will be subject to the above rights, conditions, and limitations.

With regard to the striking employees whose jobs were not filled by permanent replacements on and before June 23, 1980, or whose jobs were not abolished in that period, or, in any case, where jobs for which they are qualified have become available after any such permanent replacement or abolition, I will recommend that their rights be governed by the rules relating to the reinstatement of unfair labor practice strikers. Cf. Nelson Filter, a Division of Nelson Industries, Inc., supra; Latrobe Steel Co., supra. Thus, any permanent replacements hired on and after June 24, 1980, or any new hires for jobs which were opened commencing on that date for which the strikers were qualified, must be dismissed for the benefit of any striker who makes an unconditional offer for reinstatement to his old job which job, as above noted, was not filled before June 24, 1980, when the economic strike ceased. Thus, I shall recommend to the Board that, upon the Union's or the employees' offer unconditionally to abandon the strike and return to their old jobs, Respondent shall reinstate and recall the formerly striking employees to their old jobs, or to vacancies in jobs for which the strikers are qualified, dismissing, if necessary, any employees incumbent in those jobs who were hired on or after June 24, 1980.

The Board's rule also requires that unfair labor practice strikers be made whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of Respondent's refusal, if any, to reinstate them in a timely fashion by paying to each of them that which he would have earned as wages in the period commencing 5 days after the date on which each unconditionally offers to return to work to the date of Respondent's offer of reinstatement, less any net earnings during such period, said backpay to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

The Board's further rule is that if Respondent has already rejected, or hereafter rejects, unduly delays, or ignores, any unconditional offer by employees to return to work, or attaches unlawful conditions to its offer of reinstatement, the above 5-day period serves no useful purpose, and backpay will commence as of the unconditional offer to return to work. Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company, 236 NLRB 1637 (1978).

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[8]

The Respondent, Cote Bros. Bakery, Inc., Manchester, New Hampshire, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Threatening its employees with discharge by telling them that they are "through" if they do not return to work and abandon a lawful economic strike.

(b) Refusing to bargain in good faith with Local 348, Bakery, Confectionery and Tobacco Workers International Union of America, AFL-CIO, by insisting to bargaining impasse upon amnesty from union discipline for employees who are members of the Union who crossed the Union's picket line and worked during a lawful strike, or upon any other nonmandatory subject of bargaining, in the following appropriate unit:

> Bakery Production Department, Porters, Plant Maintenance and Shipping Departments, excluding Executives, office and clerical employees, guards, professional employees, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain collectively in good faith with the Union, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all its employees in the above-noted appropriate unit, with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, and embody any understanding reached in a signed agreement.

(b) Upon their unconditional offer to return to work, reinstate the strikers to their old jobs, dismissing, if necessary, any replacements hired in their place, except where such replacements occurred before June 24, 1980, and make them whole for any loss of earnings that they may incur in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy." Striking employees who were permanently replaced or whose jobs were abolished before June 24, 1980, shall be offered jobs when and if the permanent replacements leave, or when positions become available for which they are qualified.

(c) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, seniority records, timecards, collective-bargaining agreements, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the basis for the reinstatement of economic and unfair labor practice strikers and the amount of backpay, if any, due under the terms of this recommended Order.

(d) Post at its plant at 87 Elm Street, Manchester, New Hampshire, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[8] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[9] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(e) Notify the Regional Director for Region 1, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found herein.[10]

[10] Bearing the date of June 26, 1981, Respondent filed a post-trial motion, supported by an annexed affidavit of the same date (herein ALJ Exh. 1) by its attorney, Peter R. Kraft, Esq., to dismiss the consolidated complaint on the grounds that, effective June 13, 1981 (subsequent to the close of the record herein), Respondent's assets have been taken over and are being liquidated by Indian Head National Bank of Nashua, New Hampshire; Respondent has apparently ceased operations and will not resume operations; Respondent's employees were terminated effective June 13, 1981, without any possibility of returning to their former jobs; no meaningful remedy can now be granted; and further proceedings would be vain, costly, and contrary to the purpose of the Act and the powers of the Board.

Respondent's motion is hereby denied. The matters alleged in the motion and affidavit are not part of the record in this case, as defined by Sec. 102.45(b) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, and are not properly before me. Moreover, the issues raised by Respondent's allegations are for the compliance stage of this proceeding. See S. Freedman Electric, Inc., 256 NLRB 432, fn. 1 (1981).

Union Craft and Resilient Floor & Decorative Covering Workers Local Union No. 1179, International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades of North America and Canada. Case 17-CA-10198

December 21, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS FANNING AND HUNTER

Upon a charge filed on February 24, 1981, by Resilient Floor & Decorative Covering Workers Local Union No. 1179, International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades of North America and Canada, herein called the Union, and duly served on Union Craft, herein called Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 17, issued a complaint on March 30, 1981, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1), Section 8(d), and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge and the complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on the parties to this proceeding. Respondent failed to file an answer to the complaint.

On August 7, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion To Transfer Proceeding to the Board and for Summary Judgment, with exhibits attached, based upon Respondent's failure to file an answer as required by Section 102.20 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended. On August 12, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Respondent has filed no response to the Notice To Show Cause and, accordingly, the allegations of the Motion for Summary Judgment stand uncontroverted.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, provides as follows:

> The respondent shall, within 10 days from the service of the complaint, file an answer thereto. The Respondent shall specifically admit, deny, or explain each of the facts alleged in the complaint, unless the respondent is without knowledge, in which case the respondent shall so state, such statement operating as a denial. All allegations in the complaint, if no answer is filed, or any allegation in the complaint not specifically denied or explained in an answer filed, unless the respondent shall state in the answer that he is without knowledge, shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board, unless good cause to the contrary is shown.

According to the uncontroverted allegations of the Motion for Summary Judgment, on May 5, 1981, after certified mail was returned unclaimed, counsel for the General Counsel personally served Respondent's president and owner with copies of the charge, and the complaint and notice of hearing. The complaint and notice of hearing served on Respondent specifically states that, unless an answer to the complaint is filed by Respondent within 10 days from the service thereof, "all of the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and may be so found by the Board." According to the further uncontroverted allegations of the Motion for Summary Judgment, on May 19, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel mailed a letter to Respondent reiterating the requirement that Respondent filed an answer to the complaint and stating that counsel for the General Counsel would consider filing a motion for summary judgment if an answer was not filed by May 27, 1981. No answer has been filed.

Accordingly, under the rule set forth above, no good cause having been shown for the failure to file a timely answer, the allegations of the complaint are deemed admitted and are found to be true, and we shall grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, a sole proprietorship engaged in the installation of carpeting at various facilities including a facility located at 14200 Midland Drive, Shawnee Mission, Kansas. Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations within the State of Kansas, annually sells goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of Kansas.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Resilient Floor & Decorative Covering Workers Local Union No. 1179, International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades of North America and Canada, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Unit

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All employees of the Respondent handling the tools and materials of the trade in doing all work which may consist of measuring, cutting and laying old and new carpet, linoleum, and all types of resilient floor and wall covering material, whether in sheets, rolls, squares or interlocked, including plastic, laminated plastic, and metal wall tile, fitting devices for attachment of carpet, linoleum, rubber and all other resilient floor and wall coverings, and fitting of metal or plastic caps and corners used in the installation of linoleum and plastic counters, tables and steps, as well as artificial turf and its derivatives including monolithic covering as well as handling and preparatory work for all the above-mentioned including underlayment in the area of Kansas City and all areas in Missouri over which the Union exercises jurisdiction and the following counties in Kansas: Wyandotte, Johnson, Leavenworth, Bourbon, Linn and Miami, and such other area as may be assigned by the International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades.

B. The 8(a)(5) and (1) Violation

On or about December 20, 1979, a majority of the employees in the above-described unit designated and selected the Union as their representative for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act. At all times material, Respondent and the Union have been parties to a collective-bargaining agreement effective from April 2, 1979, through March 31, 1982, covering the terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the unit described in section III, A, above. Pursuant to this agreement, Respondent is required to make payments into the pension fund, health and welfare fund, holiday and vacation fund, apprenticeship fund and advertising fund and to pay for the employees' travel expenses. Since on or about August 1, 1980, and continuing to date, Respondent has failed and refused and continues to fail and refuse to make payments into the aforementioned funds and has failed and refused to pay employees' travel expenses.

By the aforesaid conduct Respondent has, since on or about August 1, 1980, and at all times thereafter, refused to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit. By such action, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1), and Section 8(d) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist herefrom. We shall also order Respondent to make whole his employees by making payments into the pension fund, health and welfare fund, holiday and vacation fund, apprenticeship fund and advertising fund, as required by Respondent's collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, effective April 2, 1979, through March 31, 1982.[1] We shall also order Respondent to make whole his employees by paying for their travel expenses, if any, as required by the aforementioned collective-bargaining agreement that Respondent has with the Union, with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). (See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).) We shall further order Respondent to post the attached notice.

---

[1] Since the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide at the adjudicatory stage of proceeding for the addition of interest at a fixed rate on unlawfully withheld fund payments. We leave to the compliance stage the question of whether Respondent must pay any additional amounts into the benefit funds in order to satisfy our "make-whole" remedy. These additional amounts may be determined, depending upon the circumstances of each case, by reference to provisions in the documents governing the funds at issue and, where there are no governing provisions, to evidence of any loss directly attributable to the unlawful withholding action, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of funds withheld, additional administrative costs, etc., but not collateral losses. Fitzpatrick Electric, Inc., 242 NLRB 739 (1979); Merryweather Optical Company, 240 NLRB 1213, 1216, fn. 7 (1979).

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

UNION CRAFT

Lake Development Management Co. and the Greater New Orleans Maintenance Employees Association (GNOMEA). Cases 15-CA-7751-4, 15-CA-7915, and 15-RC-6650[1]

December 21, 1981

DECISION, ORDER, AND DIRECTION

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On June 5, 1981, Administrative Law Judge James L. Rose issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs and Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a brief in support thereof and in response to the General Counsel's and the Charging Party's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] recommendations,[3] and conclusions[4] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.

1. The Administrative Law Judge concluded that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by announcing and granting a change in its vacation benefits on August 1, 1980, for its maintenance employees. While we agree with his conclusion, we do so only for the following reasons.

Before March 1, 1980, both full-time maintenance employees and salaried personnel received 5 days of vacation after 1 year of employment and 10 days after 2 years. On March 1, prior to the onset of union activity, Respondent issued two separate notices which granted salaried personnel 10 days of vacation after 1 year but reaffirmed its prior policy with respect to the maintenance employees. On August 1, 1980, prior to the August 20 representation election but after the beginning of the organizational campaign, Respondent issued a new notice regarding the maintenance employees' vacation policy. This notice read, in part, as follows:

> Note—this new policy on paid vacation applies to new hourly full time maintenance personnel hired as of 3/1/80:
> After 1 year employment—10 days paid vacation and each year thereafter.
> * * * * *
> Note—prior to this date of 3/1/80, full time hourly maintenance personnel vacation policy stays as such:
> After 1 year employment—5 days paid vacation.
> After 2 years employment—10 days paid vacation and each year thereafter.

Thus, employees hired after March 1 received 10 days' vacation after 1 year, but those hired before

[1] The Administrative Law Judge inadvertently omitted the numbers of Cases 15-CA-7915 and 15-RC-6650 from the caption of his Decision.

[2] The General Counsel, the Charging Party, and Respondent have excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

In sec. III, A, of his Decision, the Administrative Law Judge refers to Supervisor Allen Barry as Joseph Alfred Barry. He also states that a consent agreement was reached in the representation proceeding herein, whereas the election was conducted pursuant to the Acting Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election. These inadvertent errors are insufficient to affect our decision.

[3] In the absence of exceptions thereto, we adopt, pro forma, the Administrative Law Judge's recommendations that the challenges to the ballots of employees Roberson, Capretto, Johnson, David, Carroll, Giroux, Gossen, and Hurlbert be overruled.

[4] In the absence of exceptions thereto, we adopt, pro forma, the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that Respondent did not violate the Act in unilaterally changing its health, accident, and life insurance plan by assuming the entire cost of the premiums.

We adopt the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging employees Gilbert, Bennett, and Toups for refusing to accept overtime assignments in the form of "beeper duty" on June 23, 1980. In so doing, we emphasize that it appears that beeper duty was mandatory in the past, as is evidenced by employee Melanta's admission that he was once told he was "going to need to take [the beeper]" and that he did so even though he originally was not interested in volunteering. We further find that, even assuming, arguendo, that beeper duty previously had been voluntary, it is clear that on June 23 it was mandatory, and that Respondent fully apprised the employees that it was mandatory. Furthermore, we note that there is no allegation or evidence that the imposition of mandatory beeper duty was for discriminatory reasons, that it has not been shown that Gilbert, Bennett, and Toups were selected for beeper duty on a discriminatory basis, and that the employees intended their refusal to accept beeper duty to be on a continuing basis. Accordingly, we conclude that the employees were engaged in an intermittent partial strike and that Respondent could lawfully discharge them. John S. Swift Company, Inc., 124 NLRB 394, 397 (1959).

We agree with the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by President Artigues' threat to discharge employees for their union activity during her discussion with employee Gilbert concerning a union meeting. In so doing, we find without merit Respondent's contention that no such violation should be found because Artigues' threat was effectively retracted. Thus, even accepting the record testimony that Maintenance Manager Solari, at Artigues' instruction, subsequently told the employees they could attend union meetings without fear of termination, we conclude that such statement did not amount to an effective repudiation of unlawful conduct and therefore did not relieve Respondent of liability for its unlawful conduct. In this regard, Solari's statement did not disavow Artigues' threat as unlawful, disavow her other contemporaneous unlawful conduct of interrogating Gilbert, or give assurance to employees that Respondent in the future would not interfere with their exercise of Sec. 7 rights. Additionally, Respondent subsequently violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees with reprisals for engaging in union activity and by changing its vacation policy. See, e.g., United States Postal Service, 253 NLRB 1203 (1981); Passavant Memorial Area Hospital, 237 NLRB 138 (1978).

March 1 received 10 days' vacation only after 2 years.[5]

Absent an affirmative showing of some legitimate business reason for the timing, an inference of improper motivation and improper interference with employee rights may be drawn from a grant of benefits which coincides with employee union activity. J. P. Stevens and Company, Inc., 247 NLRB 420, 431–433 (1980); The May Department Stores Company, 191 NLRB 928 (1971). Respondent, in arguing that it has made such a showing, contends that the August 1 notice was not an announcement of increased benefits but rather a corrected statement of the policy then in effect. It therefore contends that prior to March it had decided to give all its employees 10 days' vacation after 1 year, that due to an administrative error the notice to maintenance employees did not reflect this change, and that it was not aware of the error until unidentified employees pointed it out to President Artigues in July, at which time she directed the preparation and posting of the August 1 notice. We find Respondent's contentions unpersuasive. Thus, despite Artigues' testimony that prior to March Respondent decided to grant all its employees 10 days' vacation after 1 year, there is no documentary evidence to support her bald assertion. Furthermore, there is no showing Respondent had a consistent past practice of granting all employees the same benefits; to the contrary, prior to May 1978, after 2 years salaried employees received 10 days of vacation, but maintenance employees received only 5 days. Additionally, although she testified that she did not see the March 1 notice before it issued, she also testified that she generally reviewed notices issuing from her office. We also note that although according to Artigues no employee pointed out the alleged error to her until sometime in July, nearly 5 months later, she also testified that the employees would normally have received the March 1 notice in their pay envelopes. Finally, we note that the August 1 notice failed to correct the alleged error, as it limited maintenance employees hired before March 1 to only 5 days of vacation after their first year of employment. It is unlikely that, after issuing an allegedly erroneous statement of its new vacation policy on March 1, Respondent would fail to remedy fully the alleged error in the August 1 notice.

In light of the above factors, we find that Respondent has not affirmatively shown legitimate business reasons for its actions. Accordingly, we conclude that, by issuing the August 1 notice announcing and granting improved vacation benefits to the maintenance employees shortly before the election, Respondent interfered with the employees' rights in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. Based on his finding that Artigues asked Gilbert what his grievances were and that Gilbert answered that Respondent had failed to give him a 50-cent-per-hour pay increase, the Administrative Law Judge concluded that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by soliciting employee complaints and grievances. Although we agree with the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Artigues questioned Gilbert on June 18 regarding his grievances, we do not agree that this question constituted an unlawful solicitation of grievances. While the solicitation of grievances raises an inference that the employer is promising to correct those inequities it discovers as a result of its inquiries, this inference is rebuttable by the employer. Cutting, Incorporated, 255 NLRB 534 (1981); Uarco Incorporated, 216 NLRB 1 (1974). We find that the inference of such a promise has been rebutted here. Thus, Artigues testified without contradiction that, after Gilbert told her he was unhappy with his salary increase, she told him that Maintenance Manager Solari gave the salary increases and that, if that were the decision, he would stand behind it. This express statement that she would not take corrective action regarding Gilbert's grievances negated any possible inference of a promise to cure his grievances. Accordingly, we conclude that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by soliciting employee complaints and grievances. However, we conclude that Artigues, by questioning Gilbert about his grievances, sought to determine his reasons for supporting the Union, and that Respondent thereby engaged in unlawful interrogation in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[6]

3. Respondent excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's recommendation that the challenge to the ballot of Willie Clark be overruled. We find merit in this exception.

Artigues testified that Clark was employed for approximately 1 week prior to the beginning of the strike on June 23, 1980, and that he did not return to work with the other employees following the end of the strike. Clark testified that he was employed by Respondent as a maintenance man for 2 to 3 weeks before he went out on strike, that on August 1 he obtained employment elsewhere as a maintenance man, and that since obtaining that employment he had never had any intention of returning to work for Respondent. He also testified that in September the Union's consultant informed him that Respondent had offered him reinstatement, and that he advised the consultant that he had decided not to return to Respondent.

[5] Following the election, on August 29, Respondent issued a revised version of the August 1 notice which granted all maintenance employees 10 days' vacation after 1 year. The Administrative Law Judge, in concluding that Respondent violated the Act by announcing a change in its vacation benefits on August 1, relied on the August 29 notice, which he incorrectly stated was issued August 1 and which was not alleged to be unlawful.

[6] Member Jenkins agrees that Artigues' questioning of Gilbert constituted unlawful interrogation in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. However, he adheres to his view, as fully set forth in his dissent in Uarco Incorporated, supra, that the mere solicitation of grievances is itself coercive conduct violative of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. See also his separate position in Cutting, Incorporated, supra. Accordingly, Member Jenkins additionally would find that Respondent coerced Gilbert in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by its solicitation of employee grievances.

The Administrative Law Judge noted that there is a presumption of continued eligibility for an economic striker, and that such presumption is not rebutted by the mere fact that the striker takes a job elsewhere. Pacific Tile and Porcelain Company, 137 NLRB 1358 (1962). He found that apart from Clark's having obtained another job there was no evidence that Clark had abandoned his employment with Respondent. Accordingly, he recommended the challenge to Clark's ballot be overruled.

Contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, we find that Respondent has presented evidence rebutting the presumption of continued eligibility. Thus, Clark testified not only that he obtained other employment before the election, but also that he at no time thereafter had any intention of returning to work for Respondent. The conclusion that Clark in fact never had any intention of returning to work for Respondent is further supported by the absence of any evidence that after obtaining new employment he manifested any interest in the affairs of Respondent and by his failure to accept Respondent's offer of reinstatement. Accordingly, we conclude that by and before the August 20 election Clark had abandoned any interest in employment by Respondent and that the challenge to his ballot should be sustained.

LAKE DEVELOPMENT MANAGEMENT CO.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES L. ROSE, Administrative Law Judge: This matter was heard before me on February 18-20, 1981, at New Orleans, Louisiana, upon the General Counsel's complaint which alleged principally that on June 23, 1980,[1] the Respondent discharged three employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. §151, et seq. The General Counsel further alleges that this unfair labor practice precipitated a strike of other employees; that the Respondent engaged in several violations of Section 8(a)(1); and that the Respondent by its unilateral institution of certain employee benefits on or about November 1 violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, should the Union be certified as the employees' collective-bargaining representative.

The Respondent generally denied that it committed any unfair labor practices and specifically alleges that the three employees were discharged for cause on June 23—for refusing, in effect, an overtime assignment. The Respondent further contends that the strike was economic; that its supervisors did not threaten or interrogate employees; and that, even if the Union should be certified as the employees' collective-bargaining representative, it had the right, during the pendency of these proceedings, to change the insurance benefits program.

Consolidated with the unfair labor practice allegations is the hearing on challenged ballots in Case 15-RC-6650.

Upon the record as a whole, including my observation of the witnesses and excellent briefs submitted by counsel for the General Counsel and the Respondent, I hereby make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

Lake Development Management Co. (herein the Respondent, the Company, or the Employer) is a partnership engaged in the business of managing about 5,000 apartment units in 40 complexes in the greater New Orleans area. The Respondent has about 200 employees of whom about 75 are hourly paid. Most of the hourly employees are maintenance men divided generally into two groups. Specifically there are one or two onsite maintenance men at the larger complexes and the others work out of a central location. The central maintenance group are the principals involved in this matter.

In the course and conduct of its business, the Respondent annually receives goods and revenues in excess of $500,000 and annually purchases and receives goods directly from points outside the State of Louisiana valued in excess of $50,000. The Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Greater New Orleans Maintenance Employees Association (herein the Union) was formed on or about June 16 by employees Robert Gilbert and Ronald Bennett, with assistance from Richard Allen Neville, who styles himself a labor relations consultant and so appeared at the hearing of this matter. However, there is testimony that he advised employees that he is an attorney licensed to practice in New England.

The Respondent admits, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Principal Facts

During the times material there were nine central maintenance employees supervised by Joseph Alfred Barry and Clarence Thomas Johnson and more remotely by Alvin F. Solari, the general property manager. These employees worked Monday through Friday from 8 a.m. until 5 p.m. and earned from $6 to $7, or so, per hour. In addition these employees were occasionally allowed to do specific maintenance jobs on a contract basis after hours and were given the opportunity to carry a beeper.

The Respondent's beeper system is the core of this controversy. Beepers are used by the Respondent primarily as a means of contacting maintenance employees for after-hours emergency service, although some maintenance employees carry beepers throughout the normal workday. The beepers are fixed channel radio receivers which one can carry and through which one can be reached by telephone for short messages. Usually the beeper carrier then follows up by placing a telephone call.

Until about April the Respondent had two beepers. Then two more were added. Thus during the time material here, the Respondent used four beepers, each of which was for certain designated apartments.

The pay week, and hence beeper duty, runs from Thursday through Wednesday. Each Thursday morning the four beepers would be on a table in the central maintenance area for employees to take and keep for 1 week. An employee carrying a beeper would be compensated $75 for the week. He would be expected to answer any calls and if necessary physically go to the appropriate apartment and perform the necessary maintenance service. Employees sometimes carried more than one beeper, substituting for the one originally on duty.

The number of messages one would receive, and after-hours calls one would have to make, varied substantially. The evidence on this is far from conclusive, although it is clear that most employees carrying the beepers were simply oncall. Most hours they neither responded to messages nor performed any kind of maintenance function.

For reasons unstated in the record, on June 16 Robert Gilbert decided to form a union. He and Ronald Bennett met with Neville and they determined to have an organizational meeting in Neville's apartment on the evening of June 18. That morning Gilbert posted a notice to this effect on the bulletin board of the maintenance lounge. At this time he had a discussion with Barry about the Union, infra, and later that day was called into the office of the Respondent's president, Patricia Artigues, infra.

At the employees' meeting on June 18, among other things Neville told them that the Company was in violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act with regard to the beeper system. He told them, or at least led them to believe, that when carrying a beeper they were entitled to be paid at the rate of one and one half-times their hourly rate for each hour. Gilbert, for instance, testified that he was then earning $7.25 an hour and was advised that when carrying the beeper he would be entitled to one and one-half times that amount for 128 hours each week (5 p.m. to 8 a.m. Monday through Saturday plus 48 hours from 8 a.m. Saturday to 8 a.m. Monday). Gilbert testified that he was led to believe, and presumably so were the others, that the Company should be paying him some $1,300 a week extra for carrying the beeper.

Neville further advised these employees that inasmuch as the Company was in violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act, if they continued the practice of taking the beepers for $75 a week that they too would be in violation of the Federal law.[2]

After being advised by Neville that they should have been paid substantially more for carrying the beeper, all those at the June 18 meeting determined that they would not carry the beeper until the Respondent agreed to pay them their due.

Thus on Thursday, June 19, the beepers were set out as usual but none was taken. Barry asked if anyone was going to take a beeper but they all declined, telling him that they would not carry the beepers unless the Company paid them what they were entitled. About 5 o'clock that afternoon and again about 4:45 p.m. on Friday, Barry asked each of the maintenance employees if he would take a beeper and each refused. He told them that their continued refusal to take the beepers could result in their discharges.

Sometime after the employees first announced that they would refuse to carry the beepers, and were threatened with possible discharge for failure to do so, they all agreed that should any one of them be discharged for failure to carry a beeper the others would go on strike. They agreed to "stick together."

On Monday, June 23, the maintenance employees were called together again, were asked to take the beepers and were told by Barry that if they refused, beepers would be assigned to individuals and if those individuals refused to take them they would be discharged. They continued to refuse.

Then Bennett, Gilbert, and Allen Toups were selected for specific assignment because, according to Barry, in the previous 3 months these individuals had beeper duty the least of any then active employee. Each refused to take the beeper and each was discharged. Bennett testified, for instance,

> When I refused to take the beeper, Al Barry told me that refusing to take the beeper—he's to be terminated for refusing to take the beeper. Then, Mr. Solari said, "Ron, read this paper first."
> Q. Okay.
> A. And I read the paper.
> Q. And then, you were asked again weren't you?
> A. Yes.
> Q. And you still refused, didn't you?
> A. Yes.

Most of the remaining maintenance employees, pursuant to their agreement among themselves, then went on strike to protest the Respondent's alleged unfair labor practice.

On June 19, Neville filed a petition for representation on behalf of the Union. A consent agreement was reached. The Union waived blocking by the unfair labor practice charge, and an election was held on August 20. There were 3 votes cast for the Union and 4 cast against it, with 26 challenged ballots. Generally, the ballots challenged by the Union were cast by individuals who replaced the striking employees. Generally, the ballots challenged by the Respondent were of those individuals the Respondent contends were terminated for cause or had abandoned their employment.

B. Contentions of the Parties

The General Counsel alleges that the discharges of Bennett, Gilbert, and Toups were violative of Section 8(a)(3) because they were discharged for having engaged in protected concerted activity, namely, refusing to carry the beepers without being appropriately compensated under the Fair Labor Standards Act; and, alternatively, because they had engaged in activity on behalf of the Union.

The General Counsel further contends that the strike of employees was precipitated by the Respondent's unfair labor practice of discharging these individuals.

It is also alleged that the Respondent engaged in violations of Section 8(a)(1) when Barry and then Artigues confronted Gilbert on June 18 and that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) on August 1 by posting new vacation holiday rules which applied to strike replacements.

Finally, the General Counsel contends that, if the Union is certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by unilaterally instituting changes in insurance coverage effective November 1.

[2] The General Counsel offered to prove that employees carrying the beepers averaged from 10 to 20 hours of work a week, and sought to litigate here the issue of whether or not they were appropriately compensated under the Fair Labor Standards Act. I conclude that the Board is not the appropriate forum to decide that issue. However, notice is taken of 29 C.F.R. 785.17 which provides that employees oncall away from the employer's premises are not entitled to pay for that time. Inasmuch as the facts demonstrate that these employees were oncall and did not actually do any work more than a few hours each week (even assuming the General Counsel's offer), it is clear that the Respondent was not liable to pay them anything remotely close to time and one-half their hourly rate for 128 hours a week. Whether the $75 a week was sufficient under the Fair Labor Standards Act is for another tribunal to decide.

In addition to the matters alleged by the General Counsel, the Union contends that its challenges to certain ballots should be sustained and those of the Respondent should be overruled.

The Respondent argues that Gilbert, Bennett, and Toups were discharged for having engaged in the unprotected act of a partial work stoppage—refusing an overtime assignment. The Respondent argues that the following strike was economic and therefore replacements were eligible to vote in the election.

The Respondent further contends that the conversations Barry and Artigues had with Gilbert on June 18 did not contain threats or interrogation in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

The Respondent claims that the announcement of vacation and holiday benefits on August 1 was simply a correction of a plan put into effect in March and therefore was not violative of Section 8(a)(1).

And, finally, the Respondent argues that, even though it unilaterally implemented a change in insurance coverage, it had the right to do so pending resolution of the challenged ballots to the election. Thus, even if the Union is certified, it should not be held to have violated Section 8(a)(5).

The Respondent also suggests that its challenges should be sustained and those of the Union should be overruled.

C. Analysis and Concluding Findings

1. The discharges

Principally the General Counsel contends that the employees had the protected right to refuse to take the beepers (a) because accepting a beeper assignment was voluntary and (b) because the Company was in violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act in its compensation to employees who carried the beepers. I disagree on both accounts.

The General Counsel concedes that beeper assignment was overtime and that the employees acted in concert in refusing. And the General Counsel recognizes the general proposition that refusal to work overtime is unprotected activity since such is an attempt by employees to prescribe for themselves their terms of work. "The Board and the courts have squarely held that such a refusal to work provides the employer with valid ground for discharge." John S. Swift Company, Inc., 124 NLRB 394, 397 (1959).

The General Counsel's argument is founded on the assertion that beeper assignment had been voluntary and therefore did not constitute a routine part of the maintenance employees' duties. Refusal to do the work, therefore, was protected strike activity, citing Polytech Incorporated, 195 NLRB 695 (1972); N.L.R.B. v. Washington Aluminum Company, Inc., 370 U.S. 9 (1962); and First National Bank of Omaha, 171 NLRB 1145 (1968).

In analyzing whether a particular act of refusing overtime is protected or not the Board often focuses on whether it is mandatory. Thus, in GAIU Local 13-B, Graphic Arts International Union (Western Publishing Co., Inc.), 252 NLRB 936, 938 (1980):

> It is also clear that the repeated refusal of employees to perform mandatory assigned overtime work is unprotected by the Act because it constitutes a recurring or intermittent partial strike.

In The Dow Chemical Company, 152 NLRB 1150 (1965), weekend overtime was voluntary; hence to refuse it was protected activity. And more recently in Jasta Manufacturing Company, Inc., 246 NLRB 48 (1979) (Member Penello dissenting), 2 hours a day overtime had always been voluntary. The company intended to change this but did not tell employees the voluntary nature of the overtime had been changed nor that they would be disciplined if they refused. Then without warning, four employees were discharged. The Board refused to conclude that by not working an hour on three occasions "they lost protection of the Act because they sought to impose on Respondent their own terms and conditions of employment."

In John S. Swift Company, Inc., supra at 397, the Board rejected a semantic argument similar to that made here by the General Counsel:

> We find no basis in this record for the distinction drawn by the Trial Examiner that the employees were not "ordered," but were merely requested, to work overtime. It is quite clear that the Respondent's intention was to order them, under pain of discharge, to work overtime, and the employees could not have understood it otherwise . . . .

The General Counsel places substantial emphasis on testimony that when hired none of the maintenance men were told that taking a beeper would be mandatory. However, what one remembers he was not told a year or more before a hearing is not as probative as an analysis of the work itself.

The Respondent had 5,000 apartment units. Without question it needed some method of providing emergency maintenance service on a regular basis. The beeper system filled this need.

Beyond this, the record is clear that prior to the events here neither the Respondent nor the employees thought in terms of whether beeper duty was mandatory. It was available for those who wanted to make some extra money. The duty was sufficiently desirable so that there was no lack of volunteers—except one time.

In early June, according to Barry, he could not get enough volunteers for the beeper and thus told employee Joseph C. Melanta (Milano in Barry's testimony) to take it. Melanta testified that the beeper was never assigned to him and it was "all voluntary." However, on cross-examination he testified to a time when Barry told him he would have to take a beeper, whereupon, "I decided I'd go ahead and take it because I could use the extra money."

There is no question that having maintenance employees on call was important to the Respondent's business; that emergency service was a job function required to be performed by maintenance employees and had in fact been done by maintenance employees for many years. And as the number of apartments increased so did the number of beepers.

That the Respondent was able to provide service by using supervisors from June 19 to June 23 is beside the point. The Respondent had a right to require of its employees that they be available for emergency service on a regular basis, and such is what they were refusing.

This work was not the kind of overtime which employees could take or not, as in Dow Chemical or Jasta Manufacturing. Nor was the refusal a one-time matter as in Polytech.

They were refusing to take the beepers in order to force the Employer to meet their pay demand with regard to them. Their announced intention was to continue refusing the beepers. But they were as clearly unwilling to accept status as strikers.

Certainly employees have a right to protest an employer's perceived violation of Federal law. If they do so concertedly such acts are generally protected, even if they are wrong. But the issue is not whether the Employer violated the Fair Labor Standards Act (as contended by the General Counsel) but whether the employees' concerted activity lost its protected character because of the means used. I conclude it did.

Had the employees protested the alleged violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act by a general strike, for instance, such would have been protected. However, the means chosen here was that of a partial work stoppage.

It may be that the method of compensating these individuals for beeper duty was violative of the Fair Labor Standards Act; however, that is far from obvious. What is obvious is that employees were not entitled to anything close to $1,300 a week for being on emergency call. In any event, the employees did not have the protected right to press their contention by means of a partial strike.

Finally, a crucial fact found wanting in those cases where the refusal to work overtime was held protected was present here. Here the Respondent warned the employees of possible discharge, and continued to the time of the discharges to try to persuade them to accept the beepers.

The General Counsel alternatively contends that Bennett, Gilbert, and Toups were discharged because they engaged in union activity, in view of the timing of the discharges, the Company's demonstrated animus, infra, and knowledge that Bennett and Gilbert were the Union's two leaders.

While timing, knowledge, and animus are factors from which an antiunion motive may be inferred, such an inference here is not warranted. The overwhelming evidence is that these employees were discharged because, and only because, they refused to take beepers when assigned to do so on June 23. The employees initiated the beeper confrontation when on Thursday they concertedly refused them. And this confrontation continued to Monday when the Respondent decided to make specific assignments, and discharge employees if necessary.

Barry kept a list of how often employees had had a beeper since April, when two beepers were added. He determined that Gilbert, Bennett, and Toups had the fewest weeks.[3] Although the Respondent had four beepers to be used, it could not be determined who should be assigned the fourth one because two employees were tied. Thus, for purposes of assignment on June 23, the Respondent decided to assign three beepers, and to terminate those employees who refused them.

There is simply no basis on this record to infer that Toups, Bennett, or Gilbert would have been discharged on June 23 absent their refusal to accept an assignment of a beeper. Indeed, they were warned again and again that refusal would mean discharge. Bennett was told before making his final decision to read the discharge letter. I believe, and conclude, that had any one of them accepted the assignment he would not have been terminated. I therefore conclude that the General Counsel did not establish by a preponderance of the credible evidence, through reasonable inference or otherwise, that the union activity of these three employees, or others, played any part in their discharge other than that associated with their decision to refuse beeper duty. The discharges of Gilbert, Bennett, and Toups on June 23 were not violative of Section 8(a)(1) or (3) of the Act.[4]

2. The strike

Although the Respondent through Barry and Artigues did commit some violations of Section 8(a)(1) on June 18, infra, it is clear from the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses that these matters played no part in the strike. The sole basis of the strike was the employees' decision to "stick together." They struck because Gilbert, Bennett, and Toups were discharged. Inasmuch as I concluded that the discharge of these individuals was not an unfair labor practice, I necessarily conclude that the strike was not an unfair labor practice strike. It was, and remained, an economic strike, which is material only to eligibility of voters in the representation matter, infra.

3. The 8(a)(1) activity

a. Allen Barry

It is alleged that on June 18 after Gilbert posted the notice of the union meeting Barry threatened employees with more onerous working conditions, threatened employees with discharge if they selected the Union, impliedly promised employees increased benefits, and solicited employee complaints and grievances.

It is generally undisputed that following the posting of the notice Barry made several comments to the assembled maintenance employees. While the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses is somewhat conflicting, basically all agree that Barry said employees were "going to get hurt by attending meetings and stuff like this" and that "the Union would only get us in trouble."

[3] To the extent that Bennett's testimony conflicts with Barry's list, I discredit Bennett. The list was made up, and seen, prior to any of the events here.

[4] In view of this conclusion, it is unnecessary to decide the Respondent's assertion that Bennett and Gilbert, having been deemed uninsurable by their automobile insurance carrier, would not be entitled to reinstatement or that Bennett engaged in sufficient post-discharge misconduct to render him unemployable.

From the generally credible testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses, I do conclude that on June 18 Barry did threaten employees with reprisals, including discharge, should they continue with their union activity. There is nothing, however, in any of the witnesses' testimony to indicate that Barry made any kind of implied promise of increased benefits and improved working conditions or solicited complaints and grievances.

It is also alleged that on June 23 Barry threatened employees with unspecified reprisals if they selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative. Bennett did testify that on that day Barry told several of the maintenance employees "the only thing y'all are going to get out of this union shit is hurt." Inasmuch as this statement was made to maintenance employees in the context of the confrontation that they were then having with the Company concerning the matter of taking beeper assignments, I conclude that in fact such amounted to a generalized threat. It was therefore violative of Section 8(a)(1), notwithstanding that the ultimate issue over which the three employees were discharged was their having engaged in unprotected activity.

b. Patricia Artigues

On the afternoon of June 18 Gilbert was called to the office of the Respondent's president. Their conversation, she testified, lasted about an hour. Although she stated that their talk about the Union lasted only about 3 minutes, it is clear that the purpose of this meeting with Gilbert related specifically to his posting the notice of the union meeting. She did not deny that she told him that a union meeting of employees was against company policy. She admitted saying that employees could be terminated if there was a "lack of communication." She also admitted asking him which employees were involved, and then followed by asking him what his grievances were. His grievance then was the Respondent had failed to give him a 50-cent-an-hour pay increase. (This was before Neville told employees that the Company was violating the Fair Labor Standards Act.)

Inasmuch as Gilbert's testimony was largely undisputed by Artigues, although there are some differences in emphasis, I find that on June 18, as alleged, the Respondent through Artigues orally interrogated an employee concerning his and others' union activity, orally threatened to discharge employees because of their union or other protected activity, and solicited employee complaints and grievances. All of this, I conclude, was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

c. The vacation and holiday notice

On August 1 the Respondent posted a notice on the subject of vacation, sick leave, and holiday pay for both the salaried and full-time maintenance (hourly and weekly) employees. The memorandum for maintenance employees has the following:

> Note—This new policy on paid vacation applies to hourly, full-time maintenance personnel who are eligible for a vacation in 1980.

Even though there is the handwritten note "revised" by the date of "8/1/80," it is clear that the policy was posted on August 1 and did by its terms offer new employees 2 weeks' vacation after 1 year rather than 1 week.

Although the Respondent contends that the change in policy occurred in March and it was through inadvertence that the change was incorrectly posted, I find that the policy was announced to employees following the beginning of the organizational campaign, before the election and during the time when there were new employees as striker replacements. Accordingly, I conclude that this announcement of the change in vacation policy made particularly applicable to striker replacements necessarily had an intimidating and coercive effect on the rights of employees to engage in protected concerted activity and was therefore violative of Section 8(a)(1).

4. The refusal to bargain

Undeniably, on or about November 1 the Respondent announced a change in its health, accident, and life insurance plan to all employees, including those in the bargaining unit. The Respondent unilaterally and without negotiating with the Union changed the plan by assuming all of the premiums.

The Union had not at the time demonstrated that it represented a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit and the matter of the election was still unresolved because of the pending challenges. Thus the Respondent contends that it was not obligated to bargain with the Union.

Citing Allis-Chalmers Corporation, 234 NLRB 350 (1978), the General Counsel contends that pending postelection challenges an employer may not with impunity institute unilateral changes. In Allis-Chalmers, however, the postelection issue involved the employer's objections to conduct affecting the results of the election which the union had won. Challenged ballots were not determinative. In Allis-Chalmers the employer knew the union had been designated by a majority of those voting and would be certified, absent the election being set aside. The employer raised the objection issue and therefore acted at its peril should that issue be resolved against it.

Such is not the case here. The vote here did not demonstrate the Union's majority status. Challenges are determinative, some of which were made by the Union. Thus even if it is finally found that a majority voted for the Union, I conclude that the Respondent did not commit an unfair labor practice by making the unilateral change. Cooks Markets, Inc., 159 NLRB 1182 (1966).

IV. THE CHALLENGES

As indicated above, the principal issue with regard to the challenged ballots concerns whether the strike of June 23 was an economic or an unfair labor practice strike. Having concluded that it was and continued to be an economic strike, it follows that the striking employees could be permanently replaced and those replacements eligible to vote, absent a showing by the Union that they were hired on a temporary basis. Kable Printing Company, 238 NLRB 1092 (1978). There is no such evidence here, hence the union challenges to the votes of strike replacements should be overruled, and the ballots of the following employees counted: Gaylord Baham, Jr., Lionel Boudreaux, Whitfield Clark, Dennis Chun, Mario Garetano, Randall Kowalewski, Lance Lanier, George Lara, Stephen Martin, Edward Montz, Jr., Kent Murphy, Joseph West, and Richard Williams.

The Employer challenged the ballots of James Roberson, David Capretto, Jeff Johnson, Paul David, Willie Clark, Frank Carroll, and Mike Giroux because they were "employed elsewhere." There is a presumption of continued eligibility for economic strikers, which is not rebutted by the mere fact that one takes a job elsewhere. Pacific Tile and Porcelain Company, 137 NLRB 1358 (1962). And here there is otherwise no evidence that these employees abandoned their employment. Quite the contrary, they all appeared at the polls and voted. Accordingly, I conclude that the challenges to these ballots should be overruled and the votes counted.

The Union also challenged the ballot of Robert Gossen because he is a supervisor. I find insufficient evidence in the record to sustain the Union's position that he has the authority set forth in Section 2(11) of the Act. On the other hand Gossen's testimony concerning his duties, as an onsite maintenance man, was credible. Accordingly, I recommend that the challenge to this ballot be overruled.

The Union challenged the ballot of Henry Gonzales, Jr. Although he was challenged as a "permanent replacement" the record supports the conclusion that he was, in fact, a security guard. Gonzales was a member of the New Orleans police department and was hired, according to Artigues, as a security guard and also to do small amounts of maintenance. While she testified that he went on full-time status in July, as a maintenance man, she did not testify that he gave up his guard duties. Some days before the election he escorted Gilbert off the Respondent's premises after flashing his badge. Thus even if Gonzales began putting in more time as a maintenance employee in July, the evidence reveals that he continued to work as a guard. Therefore he was ineligible to vote and the challenge to his ballot should be sustained.

And the Union challenged the ballot of Lloyd Hurlbert because he said he was a porter. This, of itself, is an insufficient basis to deny a voting employee the right to have his ballot counted. There is no evidence concerning his duties and only one hearsay statement that he was a porter—a job classification excluded from the bargaining unit. I recommend that the challenge to his ballot be overruled.

Finally, having concluded that Bennett, Gilbert, and Toups were discharged for cause, I conclude that the challenges to their ballots be sustained.

I recommend that Case 15-RC-6650 be remanded to the Regional Director for Region 15, that the challenges overruled be opened and counted, that a revised tally of ballots issue, and that the Regional Director issue the appropriate certification.

V. THE EFFECTS OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The unfair labor practices found above occurring in connection with the Respondent's business have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

VI. THE REMEDY

Having concluded that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

Further having concluded that certain challenges be overruled, I recommend that Case 15-RC-6650 be remanded to the Regional Director for purposes of opening and counting these ballots, issuing a revised tally of ballots and certifying the results of the election or the Union as the bargaining representative, as the case may be.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, the entire record in this matter, and pursuant to the provisions of Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[5]

The Respondent, Lake Development Management Company, Metairie, Louisiana, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

[6] The unfair labor practices engaged in by the Respondent in this matter are not so pervasive as to suggest a proclivity to violate the Act. Therefore the narrow injunctive relief is appropriate. See Hickmott Foods, Inc., 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

[7] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(b) Notify the Regional Director for Region 15, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps the Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Case 15-RC-6650 be remanded to the Regional Director for Region 15 to open and count the following ballots: Gaylord Baham, Jr., Lionel Boudreaux, David Capretto, Frank Carroll, Dennis Chun, Willie Clark, Paul David, Mario Garetano, Mike Giroux, Robert Gossen, Lloyd Hurlbert, Jeff Johnson, Randall Kowalewski, Lance Lanier, George Lara, Stephen Martin, Edward Montz, Jr., Kent Murphy, James Roberson, Joseph West, Richard Williams, and Whitfield Clark; and to issue a revised tally of ballots and appropriate certification.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On June 8, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Bruce C. Nasdor issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the Charging Party filed exceptions and a supporting brief. Respondent filed cross-exceptions to a part of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision, and also filed a brief in support of part of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Fuelgas Company, Inc., West Branch and Rose City, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

BRUCE C. NASDOR, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard at West Branch, Michigan, on November 24 and 25, 1980. The charges were filed by the Union on December 27, 1979,[1] and January 7, 1980. The complaint alleges several independent violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, and the discharge of Jack Wesch, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.[2]

Respondent denies commission of the alleged violations.

Upon the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent maintains its principal office and place of business at 2290 East Hill Road, P.O. Box 1490, in Flint, Michigan, herein called the Flint office. It maintains 26 distribution branches in the State of Michigan and is, and has been at all times material herein, engaged in the sale and distribution of propane gas and related products. Respondent's distribution branches located at 2147 I-75 Business Loop, West Branch, Michigan, herein called the West Branch branch, and Route 33 North, Rose City, Michigan, herein called the Rose City branch, are the facilities involved in this proceeding. During the year ending December 31, 1979, which period is representative of its operations during all times material herein, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, had gross revenues in excess of $500,000, and delivered at its distribution branches propane gas and other goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000, of which goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 were transported and delivered to its distribution branches in various locations throughout the State of Michigan, directly from points located outside the State of Michigan.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

It is admitted, and I find, that Local 486, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (herein called the Union), is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

In July 1979, the Union commenced an organizing campaign at Respondent's West Branch and Rose City facilities. On July 26, the Union filed a petition in Case 7-RC-15531 for the following unit of employees:

> All truck drivers, servicemen, cylinder men, utility men employed at the Employer's West Branch and Rose City, Michigan facilities, but excluding all office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[2] Subsequent to the close of the hearing, on January 27, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed a motion to dimiss par. 13 of the complaint which alleges the illegal discharge of Leo Nicefield. The basis for this motion was Nicefield's proffer to withdraw Case 7-CA-17263. Both Nicefield and Respondent concurred in counsel for the General Counsel's motion. Therefore, I am granting the motion.

An election was conducted on October 5, at both facilities voting as a single unit. Of the approximately 11 eligible voters, 9 votes were cast for the Union, 1 vote was cast against the Union, and 2 ballots were challenged. The two challenged ballots were not sufficient to affect the results of the election. On November 30, the Regional Director issued a supplemental decision certifying the Union as the collective-bargaining agent for the employees referred to in the above-described unit.

After receiving the petition, Thomas Lambert, vice president and general manager of Respondent, asked Lane Powell, industrial relations manager of Marathon Oil Company (of which Respondent is a wholly owned subsidiary), to conduct a training session regarding standards of conduct during the union organizational drive. All of Respondent's supervisory hierarchy, including branch managers, were present at this session, where Powell pointed out what kind of conduct would constitute an unfair labor practice. He stressed what to do, and what not to do, during the Union's organizational campaign. John Miller, attorney for Respondent, also advised management as to standards of conduct during the campaign. Miller was not present at this session.

Beginning on August 2, Lambert held a series of four meetings with the employees at Rose City and West Branch. At the first meeting, at West Branch, David Jacklyn, a serviceman, stated that he thought he should be paid the wage rate in a higher classification. According to the testimony of Jacklyn and Wesch, Lambert allegedly responded that he could not give the employees a raise even though they may have been in a higher job classification unless the employees got their cards back from the Union (union authorization cards), and then he could check into it, and give them a raise if they had one coming. At this same meeting employees complained about Frank Toms, branch manager, and about unsafe working conditions. Lambert, in his testimony, denied the statement attributed to him regarding the return of union authorization cards. He testified that employees, in particular Jacklyn, discussed wages. He reviewed the benefit policies of Fuelgas and pointed out his inability to grant any wage increases because of the wage and price guidelines.

Later that same day Lambert met with the employees at Rose City. At this meeting Lambert reviewed the history of Respondent and its acquisition of Greene's Gas Company. Employees brought up problems they believed existed at the plant. Lambert also asked the employees to give him a chance. Nicefield questioned the wage rate he was receiving and Lambert responded that he would check out all the problems the employees had raised. At the first meeting in West Branch, and later in Rose City, Lambert asked the employees what their problems were and why they needed the Union. The employees complained that they were lifting tanks which were filled with gas beyond the proper capacity, that they were working too much overtime, and as stated earlier they complained about Toms. Lambert told the employees he would talk to Toms and get the problems resolved. Also at the first meeting in Rose City, Lambert asked employees why they needed the Union and Nicefield complained he was not making as much money as other employees who were engaged in the same duties. Lambert allegedly responded that he could take care of that problem immediately. Moreover, he asked the employees to give him some time, that he was going to get to these problems and they should let him see what he could do. In late August, Lambert held a second meeting with the West Branch employees where he informed them that he had spoken with Branch Manager Toms, and that Respondent would make every effort to resolve the problems that had been discussed.

Thereafter, the branch managers of West Branch and Rose City commenced to conduct weekly meetings with their employees. Lambert advised the employees at West Branch during the second meeting with them that the weekly meetings would be for the purpose of employees communicating any problems they had to their branch managers. Employee Wesch testified that, during his 9 years in Respondent's employ, this was the first time such meetings had been conducted. The weekly meetings with management ceased at the Rose City branch approximately 1 week after the election, according to the testimony of Nicefield.

During the latter part of August, Jacklyn, who was the union observer at the election in West Branch, was experiencing problems with his truck. On the day in question Jacklyn called Toms at the Rose City office complaining about his truck. Toms told Jacklyn to work at the dock at West Branch until he, Toms, could get there to look at the truck. After hanging up the phone in the presence of some other employees, Jacklyn stated that he would like to kick his (Toms') ass if he were there. When Toms arrived at West Branch an employee informed him about Jacklyn's statement. Toms followed Jacklyn to the auto repair shop and brought him back to the plant in his truck. On the way back to the plant, Toms asked Jacklyn about this comment. Jacklyn admitted that he had made the alleged statement and the two of them discussed the situation and concluded that there was no sense fighting and they worked the incident out, as "gentlemen and friends." Jacklyn testified that during this conversation Toms told him "he was raising too much hell with the Union" and that Jacklyn would end up getting fired or, if the Union won the election, Respondent would "make it very hard for me to work there." Toms denied making the statements that Jacklyn attributed to him, although on cross-examination Toms testified that it was possible that the subject of the Union came up, and that he truthfully did not recall what was said about the Union.

In late August Lambert conducted a second meeting with the West Branch employees. Jacklyn testified that he told them that if the Union was voted in they would not receive the scheduled cost-of-living increase in January 1980. Jacklyn worked for Respondent from June 1977 until October 1979. He testified that, during his tenure of employment with Respondent, employees received cost-of-living raises in January of from 5 to 7 percent.

Lambert testified that he was discussing the collective-bargaining relationship between Respondent and the Union. According to him, he told the employees that cost-of-living raises were a point of negotiations and asked them rhetorically whether Respondent should give them the raises if they had voted for the Union, but if no contract had yet been negotiated.

According to the testimony of Jacklyn, Lambert held a third meeting at West Branch sometime around the middle of September. Lambert allegedly stated at this meeting that since they (the employees) received their raises they did not need the Union and that Frank Toms was working with them better. He asked the men if the reference to Toms was not so and, allegedly, stated again that they did not need the Union. In early September the employees received wage increases in varying amounts. The raises were allegedly "classification raises"; i.e., increases in pay reflecting different steps within the same classifications. Respondent takes the position that, during Lambert's meeting with the Rose City employees, Nicefield questioned his wage rate of $5 an hour. Because this rate was not specified on the Company's pay scale, Lambert became concerned and checked into the situation. He discovered that at 19 or 20 of Respondent's branches there were about 43 employees who were incorrectly classified. Accordingly, after discovering these errors he consulted with his attorney and industrial relations manager. They advised Lambert to correct the classifications and implement the wage increases. Respondent's witness, Richard Anderson, a branch manager at New Baltimore,[3] testified that Respondent's policy is to give an employee a classification raise after 6 months of employment, and then again after 18 months, at which time the employee reaches the maximum third step in the classification system.

Wesch was known to be a union adherent by virtue of the fact that he testified in mid-August on behalf of the Union at the Board representation hearing. Wesch testified in this proceeding that approximately a week before the election he talked to Frank Toms privately on or about three occasions. The conversations took place in Toms' office and according to Wesch, "He asked me what I would get out of the Union and I told him that, well, I was not sure, I would not know until the union got in there, but he said that the Union wouldn't get in, and he told me to be sure to vote no for the Union." Respondent does not deny that these statements were made by Toms to Wesch but contends that under the circumstances they do not amount to unlawful interrogation. Respondent avers that the conversation was one where Toms was merely expressing his opinion and there were no threats or statements that could in any way be construed as coercive. Moreover, Wesch's presence in Toms' office was not unusual. Respondent contends, further, that asking employees who are openly prounion why they are supporting a union is not violative of the Act.

Nicefield and James Rau, a serviceman, testified that on the night before the election they were called on the telephone by Branch Manager Richard Anderson. According to Nicefield Anderson told him that he would "hate to see me lose my job but if the Union went through, that we would all be singled out one at a time and be fired within 3 months—." According to Rau, Anderson allegedly stated "—we was making a mistake by getting a union in and he said that if it was voted in, that we would all be weeded out and fired and that he hated to see us lose our jobs." Respondent takes the position that Anderson was calling Nicefield and Rau as personal friends and merely asking them to reconsider their support for the Union and give Fuelgas a fair shake, pointing out advancement possibilities similar to his promotion. He denies telling Rau or Nicefield that they would lose their jobs. Respondent avers again that Anderson knew how they felt about the Union and he was simply expressing his own opinions; moreover, no threats were made about jeopardizing any individual's jobs.

The Termination of Jack Wesch

Wesch began his employ with Respondent in 1970. In July 1979, during the union organizational campaign, he signed a union card and distributed cards to other employees. Wesch worked at the West Branch branch; he also contacted employees at Respondent's other facilities to induce them to join the Union. He attended union meetings in July and August. Wesch testified at the representation case hearing in August on behalf of the Union. A short time after the Union was certified, Wesch asked for, and received, permission from Toms to post a notice in the West Branch facility, informing the employees that the Union had been certified and there would be a union meeting. Wesch was a transport truck-driver and he also performed light maintenance[4] on Respondent's vehicles.

Sometime after the election, Respondent discovered several unexplained acts of destruction to its property. They all occurred at the West Branch facility. The damages are documented by Respondent's records which were received into evidence. Instead of oil being used as a lubricant in a compressor, methanol was found, costing Respondent approximately $950. Truck 803 was found to contain gravel or sand in the crankcase, costing Respondent almost $1,400. Truck 801, with only 5,000 miles on it, was found to have rivets in the front assembly missing, and one wheel about to fall off.

When truck 906 was in use at West Branch, it was driven by Wesch. Wesch inspected this truck on October 22, and noted on the form used by Respondent that the foot brakes were "o.k." In December, it was discovered that transmission/power steering fluid was in the master brake cylinder rather than brake fluid. This cost Respondent almost $700 to replace and rebuild the parts in the brake system, which had been destroyed by the transmission fluid. Respondent considered these incidents to be acts of sabotage and requested the state police to keep a watch on the yard.

Generally, Wesch was assigned to drive and maintain truck 808. On November 26, the microbrake on this truck locked up. This is a switch located on the dashboard of the truck, which locks the brakes. To correct the situation, Wesch borrowed a wrench from an employee and loosened the fitting on the brakeline to purge off some of the brake fluid. By doing this he was able to release the microbrake. Wesch testified that he had trouble with this truck before, and he advised management of this 6 months prior to his termination.

[4] He changed oil, tires, and filters. During the period involved in this proceeding, he was responsible only for the vehicle he drove.

Wesch testified that he had to wait until the morning of November 27 to replace the brake fluid, because it was past quitting time on November 26 when he had the problem. According to Wesch, the backroom where the brake fluid was kept was locked.[5] He testified further that brake fluid is kept in a tall plastic bottle about a foot high and it is labeled brakefluid. The transmission/power steering fluid was also kept in the backroom, and it was in a quart container similar to an oilcan, also labeled transmission fluid. Moreover, according to Wesch's testimony, and the testimony of other witnesses, transmission fluid has a reddish color and brake fluid is clear in color.

Wesch drove the truck on November 27, 28, and 29 before going on vacation on December 6. He testified that after replacing the fluid he had no further problems with the brakes. Respondent's records revealed that no one was assigned to drive the truck from December 1 through December 5. Record evidence reveals that the truck was driven by other employees on December 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 13, and 14.

On December 11, Toms went out on deliveries with another employee on truck 808. They were making their deliveries when they began to experience problems with the brakes "hanging up." As a result they had to release fluid from the line leading to the master cylinder in order to release the brakes. As they continued making deliveries they experienced the same problems and were forced to constantly bleed the brake system. Red fluid came out of the system. After approximately six deliveries they assessed the situation and decided to return to the facility. The employee was driving and, as he approached an intersection at approximately 5:30 p.m., where there was no stoplight, the brakes failed completely. Toms told the driver to stop the truck before reaching the intersection, even if he had to drive into a dirt bank adjacent to them or into cars parked on the side of the road. They managed to stop the truck before they reached the intersection and very carefully drove it a quarter of a mile back to the facility and parked it. Toms investigated the situation and concluded that the brake system contained transmission fluid. He had the truck taken to a garage for repairs and the entire master cylinder had to be rebuilt and all of the brake lines purged. This cost Respondent $764.

Toms investigated further and found that the last individual to service the truck was Wesch. Toms called Lambert, Respondent's vice president and general manager, on December 12, and informed him what had happened and what he had discovered. Lambert advised Toms to interview Wesch and to have Thomas Jaenicke,[6] Respondent's northern Michigan regional manager, present for the interview. Lambert instructed Toms that, if Wesch admitted he had put transmission fluid into the master cylinder, then Toms was to discharge him. If Wesch did not admit to this act, Lambert advised Toms not to fire Wesch, but to investigate the matter further.

On December 17, at approximately 8:15 a.m., when Wesch returned from his vacation, he was interviewed in Toms' office by Jaenicke and Toms. Toms told Wesch what had happened, and that transmission fluid had been found in the master cylinder and had damaged the system. Toms and Jaenicke testified that Wesch admitted he had put automatic transmission fluid in the master cylinder but stated he did not think it would make any difference and, indeed, that he did the same thing to his personal truck. Wesch was told he was being terminated. He asked Toms if it was because of the Union. Toms told him that it was not because of the Union, it was strictly because of the dangerous and unsafe conditions Wesch had created. That afternoon Jaenicke prepared a summary of the investigation and the exit interview with Wesch, which has been received into evidence as Respondent's Exhibit 22. Wesch testified that he told Toms and Jaenicke he had not put transmission fluid into the master cylinder, but he had put brake fluid into it.

Conclusions and Analysis

Record testimony developed by Respondent reveals that, after receiving the petition, Lambert asked Powell, industrial relations manager, and John Miller,[7] Respondent's attorney, to meet with Respondent's supervisory hierarchy, including the branch managers, where they would be instructed as to standards of conduct during a union organizational campaign. Unfortunately, in some cases, and in my opinion this is one, clients do not always listen to the advice given to them by their attorneys. I believe the testimony of Jacklyn, who was corroborated by Wesch, that Lambert told employees in the meeting at West Branch that he could not give them classification raises unless they requested the Union to return their authorization cards. Jacklyn impressed me as a credible witness who possessed a good memory and made a sincere effort to recount the details of the meetings. I therefore find that Respondent's unlawful promise was made to employees for the purpose of having them relinquish their support for the Charging Party in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Lambert testified at some length about the various meetings he conducted. He went into great detail as to what he told the employees with respect to company policy, benefits, and Federal wage and price guidelines. I am convinced, though, that he simply chose to leave out those aspects of the meeting that counsel for the General Counsel has alleged as violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Lambert testified that Respondent did not just decide to have weekly meetings of employees in August 1979, that they had extensive training programs in the summer of 1977. Furthermore, according to his testimony he directed his branch managers in 1977 to conduct weekly meetings with employees. For 2 years[8] he did not know that the branch managers were not carrying out his directives. Thus, Lambert contends that the reason he updated this directive in the summer of 1979 was because these meetings were not being held. I discredit Lambert and reject this as being inherently untrue. I do not believe it is merely a coincidence that concurrent with receiving the petition and becoming aware of the Union's organizational campaign Respondent decided to revive an old policy which had been dormant for 2 years.

[5] The unrefuted record testimony reveals that all employees had keys to the plant gate and the backroom.

[6] Record testimony reflects that it is commonplace for Jaenicke to attend similar conferences.

[7] He did not attend this meeting.

Furthermore, the credited evidence is clear that employees were solicited with respect to problems, complaints, or grievances they had, and Respondent impliedly promised to rectify their grievances in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. I am also cognizant of the fact that Wesch, an employee of 9 years, testified that Respondent never conducted weekly meetings during his tenure.

Jacklyn, whose credibility has already been discussed, testified regarding a conversation which occurred between him and Toms in a truck that Toms was driving. I completely credit the testimony of Jacklyn with respect to the specifics of the conversation. I discredit Toms with respect to the violative comments made during the conversation, although I believe that he got carried away because of the emotional nature of the conversation. Accordingly, I find that the statements made by Toms to Jacklyn constituted threats to impose more onerous working conditions and threats of discharge because of Jacklyn's union adherence, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

It is uncontroverted that, at the meetings Lambert held with the employees, the question of a cost-of-living increase, in January 1980, was raised. Lambert, according to his testimony, attempted to couch his discussion in terms of negotiations. Jacklyn's version, which is the version I credit, reflects that Lambert told the employees at West Branch that they would not receive a scheduled cost of living raise in January 1980 if the Union won the election. Even accepting Lambert's version at best, he implied that the employees would lose the raises if they selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative. Accordingly, I conclude that this was a threat of a loss of benefit in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Respondent implemented a companywide wage increase after discovering errors in the classifications. However, there was no past practice of granting these increases. The timing of the increases would necessarily create the impression on the employees who received the increases that their complaints and grievances gave rise to the wage increases.[9] Moreover, Respondent had been put on notice some time earlier of Nicefield's classification, which was not one specified on Respondent's pay scale, but did nothing to remedy the situation until after the Union filed a petition. Furthermore Jacklyn, whom I believe, testified that Lambert told the employees after they received their raises, that they no longer needed the Union as a result of having received said raises. I therefore find that by implementing the wage increases pursuant to employee complaints and grievances, Respondent attempted to undermine the employees' support for the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Respondent concedes that Toms made the statements and inquired of Wesch what he would get out of the Union under the circumstances as testified to by Wesch. Respondent defends its position by pointing out that Wesch was a known union supporter, and that it was not unusual for him or any other employee to be in Toms' office under informal circumstances. Moreover, according to Respondent, the statements do not amount to unlawful interrogation because Respondent was merely attempting to stress its position and persuade Wesch, a known union adherent, to recognize Respondent's position. In my opinion this was not permissive interrogation, because it reasonably tended to interfere with the free exercise of Wesch's Section 7 rights. As pointed out by counsel for the General Counsel no assurances were given that the information elicited would not result in reprisals. Accordingly, I find this to be interrogation within the purview of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Anderson admitted calling Nicefield and Rau to urge them to vote against the Union. Their credible testimony reflects that Anderson told them they would lose their jobs if the Union won the election. Respondent bases its defense on the fact that Anderson was a friend of these employees, knew them socially, and had previously worked with them. Assuming this to be true, Board law still does not relieve a respondent for the statements made by its agents under the circumstances herein. I therefore find that Anderson's statements to these employees were threats in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The Termination of Wesch

In my opinion, Wesch, who had been driving a truck for over 30 years, did in fact put transmission fluid into the master cylinder of truck 808. I further believe that, at the exit interview, Wesch admitted to Toms and Jaenicke that he had put transmission fluid in the brake system, and stated he did not think it would make any difference because he did the same thing with his personal truck. With all the destruction that had occurred to Respondent's equipment I do not believe it was unreasonable for management to act as they did, even though Respondent had no way of proving that Wesch was engaging in sabatoge. It was not in my opinion unreasonable for Respondent to have suspected Wesch. It is also noted that the individuals who were working on the other pieces of equipment which they discovered to have been damaged are the same individuals who reported these acts to management. In Wesch's case this was not the situation, because the individuals driving the truck were the ones who experienced the brake failure, not Wesch. I am not unmindful of the fact that Wesch testified that he advised Respondent 6 months prior thereto that he was experiencing difficulty with the brakes.

---

[8] Rose City was not acquired until January 1979.

[9] Moreover, it is noted that Respondent, at an earlier date, held out the promise of remedial action in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. See St. Francis Hospital, 249 NLRB 180 (1980).

Although I have concluded that Respondent engaged in various acts in violation of Section 8(a)(1), during the preelection period, I find that the motivation for discharging Wesch almost 3 months later was his admission with respect to putting transmission fluid in the master cylinder of the truck, and not his union activity.

I do not regard Wesch as a credible witness with respect to the testimony he offered in support of his discharge. For example, he testified that he had to wait until the morning after he had trouble with the brakes, because it was after quitting time, and the backroom where the brake fluid was located was kept locked. The uncontroverted testimony by Toms is that all employees had access to the plant and the backroom, 24 hours a day, by virtue of the fact that they all had keys to the plant gate and the back door of the building.

The record is clear that there were other individuals who were equally active on behalf of the Union (e.g., Jacklyn) who were not discharged. The record is also clear that these individuals were known union adherents. I do not believe that Respondent waited 3 months to retaliate against Wesch because of his union activities.

Accordingly, I will recommend that the allegations that Wesch was discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act be dismissed.

Respondent raises an affirmative defense, that the allegations in the complaint alleging independent violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act exceed the scope of the unfair labor practice charges. In section 2 of the form "Charge Against Employer," there is a "catchall" clause which is part of the form itself stating, "[b]y the above and other acts, the above named employer has interfered with, restrained and coerced employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act." Thus, the complaint does not expand upon the charges and the allegations are related to the charges. Therefore, Respondent's defense in this regard is without merit.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By telling employees that they would receive higher wages in exchange for relinquishing their support for the Union, Respondent has committed unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By soliciting complaints and grievances from employees, with the implication or promise that Respondent would favorably resolve those complaints and grievances, Respondent has committed unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. By threatening employees with more onerous working conditions and/or discharge because of their support for the Union, Respondent has committed unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

6. By threatening to withhold a scheduled wage increase if the employees selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative, Respondent committed a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. By implementing a wage increase pursuant to employee complaints and grievances, Respondent committed a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

8. By interrogating an employee regarding his union sympathy and support, Respondent committed a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

9. By threatening employees with discharge in the event the Union won the election, Respondent committed a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

10. The allegations of the complaint that Respondent has engaged in conduct violative of Sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act have not been supported by substantial evidence.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Painters District Council No. 36 and Sammie L. Brown, d/b/a Brown & Co. Painting Contractor. Case 31-CB-3895

December 21, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On June 24, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Jay R. Pollack issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.

We agree with the Administrative Law Judge that Respondent represented, or at least showed an interest in representing, the Charging Party's employees at the time it disciplined supervisor-member Jacob Brown for working for the Charging Party, a "nonaffiliated contractor," and that the imposition of such discipline violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act because it had the reasonably foreseeable effect of interfering with the Charging Party's chosen representative for purposes of adjusting grievances.

Respondent contends that the instant case is governed by the Ninth Circuit's decision in Chewelah Contractors,[1] where the court found that a union does not violate Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act by disciplining a member who works for a nonsignatory employer if it neither represents nor shows an intent to represent the employer's employees. The Administrative Law Judge found that Chewelah Contractors is inapposite because Respondent's representative status was presumed to continue after the collective-bargaining agreement expired,[2] since, prior to the contract's expiration, Respondent expressed its intent to bargain with the Charging Party on an individual basis, and since Respondent did not affirmatively abandon its interest in bargaining for a new agreement as shown by its failure to respond negatively to the Charging Party's September 24 letter which granted Respondent until October 6 to request negotiations.

We agree that Chewelah Contractors is inapposite. We find it unnecessary, however, to rely on the Charging Party's September 24 letter as evidence of Respondent's representative intent. Instead, we find that Respondent's continuing interest in representing the Charging Party's employees is clearly shown by the series of telephone calls between the parties in July, a month after the contract expired, wherein Respondent stated that it would not dispatch workers or apprentices until the Charging Party signed a new contract. We further find that Respondent failed to present any evidence which showed that, thereafter, it abandoned its intent to continue to represent the employees. Therefore, we find, in agreement with the Administrative Law Judge, that Respondent represented or maintained an interest in representing the Charging Party's employees at the time the discipline was imposed against Brown.[3]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Painters District Council No. 36, Los Angeles, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(a):

"(a) Restraining or coercing Sammie L. Brown, d/b/a Brown & Co. Painting Contractor in the selection of its representative for the purpose of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances by preferring charges, holding a trial, fining, or otherwise disciplining any such representative performing supervisory, managerial, or grievance-adjustment functions for said Employer."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

In finding that Respondent violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(B), Member Fanning relies upon the views set out in his separate opinion in International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 323 (Drexel Properties, Inc.), 255 NLRB 1395 (1981), and he would not find that in all instances a supervisor is immune from union discipline, as suggested by the Order, as amended, in this case.

We will not restrain or coerce Sammie L. Brown, d/b/a Brown & Co. Painters District Council No. 36

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Jay R. Pollack, Administrative Law Judge: This matter was heard before me in Los Angeles, California, on May 7, 1981. Pursuant to a charge filed against Painters District Council No. 36 (Respondent) by Sammie L. Brown, d/b/a Brown & Co. Painting Contractor (the Charging Party),[1] on September 12, 1980,[2] the Regional Director for Region 31 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint against Respondent on October 20, alleging that Respondent committed certain violations of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (the Act). In substance, the complaint alleges that Respondent, by disciplining Jacob Brown, a supervisor employed by the Charging Party, has restrained and coerced, and is restraining and coercing, the Charging Party in the selection of its representatives for the purpose of collective bargaining or adjustment of grievances in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act. Respondent filed an answer denying that Jacob Brown was a supervisor and denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

Upon the entire record,[3] from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the post-hearing briefs of the General Counsel and the Charging Party,[4] I make the following:

Findings of Fact and Conclusions

I. JURISDICTION

The Charging Party is now, and has been at all times material herein, a sole proprietorship of Sammie L. Brown, with an office and principal place of business located in Los Angeles, California, where it is engaged as a painting subcontractor in the building and construction industry. During calendar year 1980, Respondent performed services in excess of $50,000 for Shirley Brothers and Goldrich & Kest, both general contractors located in California. I find that Shirley Brothers meets the Board's jurisdictional standards on a direct inflow basis by virtue of annual purchases in excess of $50,000 of materials and suppliers from suppliers located outside the State of California. I also find that Goldrich & Kest meets the Board's jurisdictional standards on a direct inflow basis by virtue of annual purchases in excess of $50,000 of materials and supplies from suppliers located outside the State of California.

Accordingly, I find that the Charging Party meets the Board's indirect outflow standard for asserting jurisdiction over a nonretail enterprise. See Siemons Mailing Service, 122 NLRB 81 (1958). Thus, I find that the Charging Party is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Bargaining Relationship

As stated above, the Charging Party is a sole proprietorship of Sammie L. Brown who normally employed eight or more journeymen painters. The parties agree that the Charging Party was bound to a collective-bargaining agreement between the Los Angeles County Painters and Decorators Contractors Association, Inc., and Respondent (including all of its affiliated local unions), which agreement was effective by its terms from July 1, 1977, until June 30, 1980 (hereinafter referred to as the 1977-80 agreement).

On January 31, 1980, Sammie L. Brown wrote the Los Angeles County Painters and Decorators Joint Committee, Inc., with a copy to Respondent, giving notice of his intent to terminate the 1977-80 agreement as of June 30. On February 20, Ray De Namur, Respondent's executive secretary, wrote Sammie L. Brown acknowledging receipt of Brown's intent to terminate the contract and advising Brown that Respondent desired to negotiate with the Charging Party "on an individual basis prior to the expiration date of June 30." Although the Charging Party, through its attorneys, requested negotiation meetings with the Union, negotiation on a single-employer basis never commenced. On September 24, the Charging Party, through its attorney, notified Respondent's attorneys that:

[2] Unless otherwise stated, all dates refer to calendar year 1980.

[3] On May 28, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel made a motion to correct the record. As the motion was unopposed, the corrections contained therein are hereby granted and incorporated, sua sponte, into the record as ALJ Exh. 1.

[4] Respondent argued orally at the hearing but did not file a brief.

> In light of the union's failure to respond to any of these requests for negotiations, the company can only assume that the union no longer wishes to represent Brown & Company's employees. Therefore, effective October 6, 1980, the company intends to implement the terms and conditions contained in the attached bargaining proposals, unless the union requests negotiations prior to that date.

Apparently, Respondent did not request negotiations with the Charging Party, nor did it respond to the letter.

B. The Supervisory Status of Jacob Brown

Jacob Brown is the brother of Sammie L. Brown and has been employed by the Charging Party for approximately 10 years. Jacob Brown serves as painting foreman for the Charging Party and, except for occasional visits by his brother, is the individual in charge at the jobsites. Jacob Brown's general duties are to see that the painting work is performed safely and correctly. Jacob Brown is paid $2 an hour more than the journeymen painters. During his 10 years of employment, Jacob Brown has recommended the discharge of three or four employees for inadequate performance, with the result that all such employees were discharged by Sammie L. Brown. With respect to hiring, Jacob has hired three or four applicants and rejected others, without checking with Sammie. Finally, Jacob testified that he resolves employee complaints about working conditions without checking with Sammie and that, therefore, Sammie does not have to deal with such complaints.

Based on the foregoing facts, I find that Jacob Brown is now, and has been at all times material herein, a supervisor of the Charging Party within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. I further find that Jacob Brown was a natural and potential representative of the Charging Party for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act. See Norwalk Typographical Union No. 529 (The Hour Publishing Co.), 241 NLRB 310 (1979).

C. The Union Discipline

Jacob Brown has been a member of affiliate local unions of Respondent for approximately 14 years. On August 20, charges were filed by Jack Mike, a business representative, against Jacob for "working for Brown & Co. Painting. A nonaffiliated contractor."[5] On August 28, Respondent notified Jacob of the charges filed against him and set a trial of the case for the evening of September 18 at Respondent's offices in Los Angeles, California. On September 9, Jacob wrote Respondent requesting the specifics of the charges against him. On September 12, Respondent, by Executive Secretary De Namur, sent Jacob copies of the notice of his alleged violations, the applicable provisions of the Union's constitution and bylaws, and the applicable contract provisions. Jacob did not attend the trial on September 18, but was notified by letter dated September 19 that he had been found guilty of the alleged violations and had been fined $600, $300 payable within 30 days and the remaining $300 suspended provided that there were no further violations for a period of 2 years. The record is silent as to whether Jacob paid any portion of the fine.

D. Conclusions

Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act provides that "it shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization . . . to restrain or coerce . . . an employer in the selection of his representative for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances." The applicable principles of law are as follows:[6]

> Section 8(b)(1)(B) prohibits both direct union pressure—for example, strikes—to force replacement of grievance representatives and indirect union pressure—for example, union discipline of supervisor-members—which may adversely affect the chosen supervisors' performance of their representative functions. American Broadcasting Companies v. Writers Guild of America, West, Inc., et al., 437 U.S. 411 (1976); New Mexico District Council of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America (A. S. Horner, Inc.), 177 NLRB 500, 502 (1969), enfd. 454 F.2d 1116 (C.A. 10, 1972); and Wisconsin River Valley District Council of Carpenters (Skippy Enterprises Inc.), 218 NLRB 1063, 1064 (1975), enfd. 532 F.2d 47 (C. A. 7, 1976).
> It is also well settled that union discipline of supervisor members who cross a picket line or otherwise violate a union's no-work rule in order to perform their normal supervisory functions constitutes indirect union pressure within the prohibition of Section 8(b)(1)(B). In reaching this conclusion, the Board and courts have recognized that the reasonably foreseeable and intended effect of such discipline is that the supervisor-member will cease working for the duration of the dispute, thereby depriving the employer of the grievance adjustment services of his chosen representative. American Broadcasting Companies, supra, 437 U.S. at 433-437, note 36; N.L.R.B. v. International Union of Operating Engineers, Local Union No. 501, 580 F.2d 359, 360 (C.

[5] Jacob testified that on August 15, the date of his alleged violation, he was probably showing employees how he wanted certain items painted.

[6] As recently set forth by Administrative Law Judge Shapiro in Plumbers, Steamfitters and Refrigeration Local No. 364 (West Coast Contractors), 254 NLRB 1123 (1981).

> A. 9); A. S. Horner, supra, 177 NLRB at 502; and Skippy Enterprises, supra, 218 NLRB 1064, enfd. 532 F.2d at 52-53. Such discipline is unlawful even where as here the supervisor defies the union and continues to work for the employer during the dispute; the discipline is unlawful because the supervisor, having been disciplined for working during a labor dispute, may reasonably fear further discipline and hence will be deterred from working during any future disputes. The employer, in such circumstances, must either replace the disciplined supervisor or risk loss of his services during a future dispute; in either event, the employer is coerced in the selection and retention of his chosen grievance adjustment representative. American Broadcasting Companies, supra, 437 U.S. at 433-437.

In light of the foregoing principles, Respondent's discipline of the Charging Party's supervisor, Jacob Brown, because he worked for a nonunion employer, restrained and coerced the Charging Party in the selection and retention of its grievance adjustment representative.

Respondent, relying on the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in the Chewelah Contractors case,[7] argues that union discipline of a member who works for a nonsignatory contractor is not a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(B), even though that member is a supervisor, unless it is clear that the union's object is to influence the supervisory function.

In Chewelah Contractors, the court, in refusing to enforce the Board's finding of a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(B), stated that the purposes of the section were to prevent unions from forcing employers into or out of multiemployer bargaining units and to guarantee that an employer's bargaining representative would be completely faithful to the employer's desires. The court noted that, in any decision involving Section 8(b)(1)(B) that had come to its attention, the charged union had been the bargaining representative of the complaining company's employees. However, the charged union in Chewelah Contractors neither represented the company's employees nor demonstrated a desire to represent the employees. The court reasons that the union had no incentive to influence the company's choice of representative or affect the member's loyalty to the company. Thus, the court held that a union does not violate Section 8(b)(1)(B) by disciplining a member, even though that member is also the bargaining representative of an employer if the union neither represents nor shows an intent to represent the employer's employees.

I find that the court's opinion in Chewelah Contractors is inapposite because the record establishes that Respondent represented or showed an interest in representing the Charging Party's employees at the time of the subject discipline. As noted above, Respondent represented the Charging Party's employees for some time prior to the expiration of the 1977-80 agreement. At the expiration of the agreement, Respondent was presumed to be the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees. See, e.g., Pioneer Inn Associates, d/b/a Pioneer Inn and Pioneer Inn Casino, 228 NLRB 1263 (1977), enfd. 578 F.2d 835 (9th Cir. 1978); Sahara-Tahoe Corporation, d/b/a Sahara-Tahoe Hotel, 229 NLRB 1094 (1977). Further, Respondent had expressed an intent to continue representation and bargain for a contract on an individual employer basis. The record does not establish that Respondent affirmatively abandoned its intent to bargain for a new agreement for the Charging Party's employees. Rather, Respondent failed to respond to the Charging Party's correspondence which, by its terms, granted Respondent until October 6 to request negotiations. Thus, during August, when the intraunion charges were filed against Jacob Brown, and September, when the discipline was imposed, Respondent represented the Charging Party's employees or at least showed an interest in representing said employees.

Respondent argues that the General Counsel must prove that the union's object is to influence the supervisory function. However, in Chicago Typographical Union No. 16 (Hammond Publishers, Inc.), 216 NLRB 903, 903-904 (1975), the Board stated that a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(B) does not turn on a determination of the motivation behind a union's act of discipline, but rather on a determination of the reasonable effect of that discipline on the supervisor's activities as an 8(b)(1)(B) representative.

The Board has continued to adhere to the reasonable effect test. See e.g., Chewelah Contractors, supra, 231 NLRB at 811-812; West Coast Contractors, supra; New York Newspaper Printing Pressman's Union No. 2 (New York News, Inc.), 249 NLRB 1284, 1285 (1980). Applying the effect test here, I find that the reasonable and foreseeable consequences of Respondent's discipline of Jacob Brown is that the supervisor-member would cease working for his employer until a contract was signed or cease working for his employer in future disputes, thereby depriving the Charging Party of its chosen representative for the purposes of grievance adjustment. See American Broadcasting Companies, supra, 437 U.S. at 436, fn. 36; N.L.R.B. v. International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 501, supra, 580 F.2d at 360. Thus, I conclude that by disciplining Jacob Brown, Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

IV. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Upon the basis of the foregoing findings of fact and on the entire record in the case, I make the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) and Section 8(b) of the Act.
2. The Charging Party is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[7] N.L.R.B. v. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 73, AFL-CIO [Chewelah Contractors, Inc.], 621 F.2d 1035 (9th Cir. 1980), denying enforcement of 231 NLRB 809 (1977).

3. Jacob Brown, at all times material herein, was a supervisor for the Charging Party within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and a natural and potential representative of the Charging Party for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

4. By preferring intraunion charges against Jacob Brown, holding hearing on said charges, and imposing a fine against him, Respondent restrained and coerced the Charging Party in the selection and retention of its representative for the purposes of collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

---

[8] All outstanding motions inconsistent with this recommended Order hereby are denied. In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

RPM Beef, Inc. and Butchers Union Local No. 126, United Food and Commercial Workers, AFL-CIO. Case 32-CA-3847

December 21, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

Upon a charge filed on August 10, 1981, by Butchers Union Local No. 126, United Food and Commercial Workers, AFL-CIO, herein called the Union, and duly served on RPM Beef, Inc., herein called Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 32, issued a complaint on September 2, 1981, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge and complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on the parties to this proceeding.

With respect to the unfair labor practices, the complaint alleges in substance that on July 14, 1981, following a Board election in Case 32-RC-1211, the Union was duly certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the unit found appropriate;[1] and that, commencing on or about July 20, 1981, and at all times thereafter, Respondent has refused, and continues to date to refuse, to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative, although the Union has requested and is requesting it to do so.[2] On September 16, 1981, Respondent filed its answer to the complaint admitting in part, and denying in part, the allegations in the complaint.

On October 6, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment. Subsequently, on October 8, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Respondent thereafter filed a response to the Notice To Show Cause.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

In its answer to the complaint and response to the Notice To Show Cause, Respondent contends that the Board erroneously issued a Certification of Representative for the Union because it improperly overruled Respondent's objections to the election. The General Counsel argues that all material issues have been previously decided in the related representation proceeding. We agree with the General Counsel.

Review of the record herein, including the record in Case 32-RC-1211, reveals that on December 3, 1980, the Regional Director for Region 32 approved a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election agreed to by the Union and Respondent. An election was conducted on December 23, 1980, which resulted in a vote of 11 for, and 4 against, the Union. There were four challenged ballots, a number insufficient to affect the results of the election. On December 29, 1980, Respondent filed objections to conduct affecting the results of the election. On January 21, 1981, the Regional Director issued and served on the parties his Report on Objections, Order, and Notice of Hearing, in which he directed a hearing on Respondent's Objections 1, 2, 5, 19, and 20. At the hearing, conducted on February 11, 1981, Respondent alleged that the Union made material misrepresentations to the employees regarding the Employer's profitability, the compensation received by the owners of the Employer, and benefits and wages provided at union plants. Respondent also alleged that the Union made unlawful promises of wages and benefits in return for favorable votes. Both independently and cumulatively these acts were claimed to have destroyed the "laboratory conditions" required for the election.

In her Report on Objections and an Amendment to Report on Objections, issued on April 2 and April 7, 1981, the Hearing Officer found that no material misrepresentations or unlawful promises were made, and therefore recommended that Respondent's Objections 1, 2, 5, 19, and 20 be overruled in their entirety. On April 9, 1981, Respondent filed with the Board exceptions to the Hearing Officer's Report on Objections. On July 14, 1981, the National Labor Relations Board issued its Decision and Certification of Representative, in which it adopted the Hearing Officer's recommended disposition of Respondent's Objections 1, 2, 5, 19, and 20 and certified the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees of Respondent in the unit described in the stipulation.

[1] Official notice is taken of the record in the representation proceeding, Case 32-RC-1211, as the term "record" is defined in Secs. 102.68 and 102.69(g) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended. See LTV Electrosystems, Inc., 166 NLRB 938 (1967), enfd. 388 F.2d 683 (4th Cir. 1968); Golden Age Beverage Co., 167 NLRB 151 (1967), enfd. 415 F.2d 26 (5th Cir. 1969); Intertype Co. v. Penello, 269 F.Supp. 573 (D.C.Va. 1967); Follett Corp., 164 NLRB 378 (1967), enfd. 397 F.2d 91 (7th Cir. 1968); Sec. 9(d) of the NLRA, as amended.

In its response to the Notice To Show Cause, Respondent alleges as the basis to deny the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment the same union conduct it raised in its objections to the election and its exceptions to the Hearing Officer's report. It thus appears that Respondent is attempting to raise herein issues which were raised and determined in the underlying representation case.

It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues which were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding.[3]

All issues raised by Respondent in this proceeding were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding, and Respondent does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege that any special circumstances exist herein which would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding. We therefore find that Respondent has not raised any issue which is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent is a California corporation, with an office and place of business in Fresno, California, engaged in the retail and nonretail sales of meat products. During the past 12 months Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchased and received goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California, and derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000.[4]

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Butchers Union Local No. 126, United Food and Commercial Workers, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Representation Proceeding

1. The unit

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time butchers, wrapping employees, shipping and receiving employees, and drivers employed by the Employer at its 2413 S. Fruit Street, Fresno, California, location; excluding all office clerical employees, sales employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

2. The certification

On December 23, 1980, a majority of the employees of Respondent in said unit, in a secret-ballot election conducted under the supervision of the Regional Director for Region 32, designated the Union as their representative for the purpose of collective bargaining with Respondent.

The Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in said unit on July 14, 1981, and the Union continues to be such exclusive representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. The Request To Bargain and Respondent's Refusal

Commencing on or about July 20, 1981, and at all times thereafter, the Union has requested Respondent to bargain collectively with it as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the above-described unit. Commencing on or about July 20, 1981, and continuing at all times thereafter to date, Respondent has refused, and continues to refuse, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative for collective bargaining of all employees in said unit.

Accordingly, we find that Respondent has, since July 20, 1981, and at all times thereafter, refused to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, and that, by such refusal, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

[4] In its answer to the complaint and response to the Notice To Show Cause, Respondent denied that it is engaged in the retail sale of meat. In the Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election, however, Respondent agreed that it did engage in retail sales. In any event, Respondent does not contest the Board's jurisdiction.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of RPM Beef, Inc., set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and, upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.[5]

In order to insure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of certification as beginning on the date Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit. See Mar-Jac Poultry Company, Inc., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Commerce Company d/b/a Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817; Burnett Construction Company, 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

6. By the aforesaid refusal to bargain, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing, employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

December 23, 1981

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

By Chairman Van de Water and Members Fanning and Hunter

Pursuant to authority granted it by the National Labor Relations Board under Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, a three-member panel has considered objections to and determinative challenges in an election held on October 7, 1980,[1] and the Hearing Officer's report recommending disposition of same. The Board has reviewed the record in light of the briefs and hereby adopts the Hearing Officer's findings and recommendations,[2] except as modified herein.

The Hearing Officer found that Judy Crawford was not a supervisor under Section 2(11) of the Act and recommended overruling the challenge to her ballot. His determination that Crawford was not a supervisor was based, inter alia, on his conclusion that her alleged supervisory functions were isolated and routine in nature and did not require the use of independent judgment. Additionally, the Hearing Officer found that Crawford had no authority to assign work, hire, fire, suspend, lay off, transfer, or promote employees, or to effectively recommend such action.

The Petitioner has excepted to the Hearing Officer's recommendation to overrule the challenge to Crawford's ballot and contends that Crawford is a supervisor because, based on the Hearing Officer's own findings, Crawford has the authority to grant or deny sick leave and vacation leave, to discipline an employee, to evaluate her work performance, and effectively to recommend that her salary be increased. We find merit in the Petitioner's exceptions.

Crawford is a secretary in the Employer's "assessment and consultation" (herein AC) unit working directly under the executive/administrative assistant to the Employer's director. The only other secretary in the unit is Paula Antell. Crawford and Antell each receive work assignments from and perform primarily secretarial duties for one of two separate groups of professionals in the AC unit. When one of the secretaries is absent for a significant length of time, the other assumes both sets of secretarial duties.

Crawford trained Antell when the latter was hired by the Employer in September 1979. Additionally, since approximately June 1980, Crawford has approved Antell's request for time off and has filled out monthly time summary sheets for Antell. Crawford signs both the leave approval and time summary forms in the space designated for supervisory approval.[3] Further, as the Hearing Officer found, Crawford has authority to discipline Antell and has exercised this authority in the past. Thus, on one occasion when a nutritionist for whom Antell performed secretarial work had a problem with Antell's work attitude, Crawford counseled Antell regarding her attitude and disposition.On another occasion, Crawford directed Antell to make up work time lost due to her lateness.

Most significantly, Crawford prepared Antell's annual evaluation in which she recommended that Antell be raised to a higher salary level. Crawford discussed this evaluation with Antell and signed it in the space designated for "supervisor." There is no evidence of any additional independent supervisor investigation of Antell regarding the salary increase. Crawford's recommendation was approved by the Employer's director.

Section 2(11) of the Act defines a supervisor as "any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommended such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment." It has repeatedly been pointed out that, since this definition is stated in the disjunctive, possession of any of the enumerated powers or attributes is sufficient to establish the existence of supervisory status.[4]

[1] The election was conducted pursuant to a Decision and Direction of Election. Of approximately 17 eligible voters, 8 cast ballots for and 7 against the Petitioner. There were two challenged ballots, a number sufficient to affect the election results. In addition, the Petitioner filed objections to the election. Following an investigation, the Regional Director issued his Supplemental Decision in which he overruled the Petitioner's Objections 1 and 2 and ordered that a hearing be held to resolve the factual and legal issues raised by the Petitioner's Objections 3 and 4 and by the two challenged ballots. Thereafter, a hearing was held and the Hearing Officer issued a report on challenges and objections.

[2] In the absence of exceptions thereto, we adopt, pro forma, the Acting Regional Director's recommendations that the challenge to the ballot of Terry Wilson be sustained, that the Petitioner be allowed to withdraw its Objection 3, and that the Petitioner's Objection 4 be overruled.

[3] The Hearing Officer found that the Employer's accounting office considered Crawford to be Antell's supervisor and automatically sent her the personnel forms for Antell which are generally sent to an employee's supervisor.

lishes that she counsels and disciplines Antell,[5] evaluates her performance, and has effectively recommended an increase in her salary.[6] Additionally, Crawford has authority to grant or deny Antell's leave requests. Concededly, these supervisory functions do not occupy the majority of Crawford's time, but Crawford's constant possession of supervisory authority, regardless of the frequency of its exercise, is to be distinguished from instances where an individual lacks supervisor status because he possesses supervisory authority sporadically or infrequently.[7] Moreover, the relatively few instances of Crawford's exercise of supervisory authority are explicable by her relatively recent assumption of supervisory authority over Antell (June 1980), and the fact that she supervises but one employee, a factor that in itself does not bar supervisory status.[8] Finally, Crawford performs her disciplinary and evaluation functions independently and these functions are those which require discretion and independent judgment.

In view of the foregoing, we find that Crawford is a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. Accordingly, we conclude that the challenge to Judy Crawford's ballot should be sustained. Since both the challenges to ballots in the election have been sustained, the tally shows that a majority of valid ballots have been cast for the Petitioner. Accordingly, we shall issue a Certification of Representative.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

It is hereby certified that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for Social Services Union, Local 525, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO, and that, pursuant to Section 9(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the said labor organization is the exclusive representative of all the employees in the unit found appropriate herein for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment:

> All clerical employees employed by the Employer at its facilities located in Bakersfield, Ridgecrest, Shafter, Delano and Lamont, California, excluding professional employees, Client Program Coordinator Assistants, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, as amended.

December 28, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

On April 23, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Nancy M. Sherman issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel and the Union filed exceptions and supporting briefs and Respondent filed cross-exceptions and an answering brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt her recommended Order, as modified herein.

The Administrative Law Judge found, and we agree, that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by terminating its operations at its Chicago, Illinois, facility without prior notice to the Union and without affording it an opportunity to bargain with Respondent concerning the effects of such conduct on unit employees. However, we disagree with her further finding that no Transmarine backpay order[2] is warranted in the circumstances of this case.

The record shows that the unit employees were covered by a 3-year collective-bargaining agreement effective to September 1980. Prior to the vacation period which traditionally ends in mid-August, Respondent Seeburg had in mid-July 1979 an active payroll of about 385 or 395 employees. However, as Seeburg had financial or cash-flow problems, no one was called back to work until mid-September 1979 when only 250 unit employees were recalled.

On October 19, 1979, Seeburg filed a petition for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Act. At this time, there were further layoffs and, by January 1980, the complement was reduced to about 60 employees. By February 4, 1980, only seven employees were still actively working.[3] It appears the layoffs and recalls took place in accordance with the seniority provisions of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement and that the Union did not request bargaining or object to any of the layoffs when they occurred.

On February 4, 1980, the bankruptcy court appointed Nathan Yorke to act as Seeburg's trustee in bankruptcy and Yorke was given authority to continue to operate the business. At a creditors' meeting on February 8, 1980, Yorke learned from Joseph P. Dillon, Seeburg's treasurer and chairman of its board, that Seeburg had lost about $350,000 since it had filed its October 19, 1979, petition, and that its liabilities exceeded $8 million and the book value of its assets approximated $6 million which, when liquidated, amounted to about $1.5 million. On February 11, 1980, Yorke requested, and the bankruptcy court issued, an order authorizing him, inter alia, to curtail Seeburg's operations by "terminating all personnel save certain key individuals who will be retained for services the trustee deems necessary in furtherance of the instant reorganization . . . ."

Upon receipt of the order on February 11, Yorke shut down the plant facility used by both Seeburg and Seeburg Service and released all personnel including the seven unit employees who were still working on that date.[4] Four days later, the Union found out about the shutdown and demanded that an immediate meeting be set up to discuss, inter alia, the effects of Yorke's action. In his reply of February 25, Yorke failed to accede to this demand. Thereafter, the bankruptcy court authorized Yorke to offer some parts for sale and, in April 1980, Yorke and Dillon made arrangements with the Union to recall two or three individuals to assist in this endeavor. According to Yorke, he "operated the business" until July 1980, when, pursuant to a court-approved reorganization plan, Seeburg and its purchaser in liquidation, Stern Electronics, agreed to set aside $49,000 of the estate's assets should a finding of backpay liability ultimately be made by the Board.[5] In addition, Stern Electronics agreed to cover an additional $6,000 of potential backpay liability. Upon completion of the sale at the end of July 1980, Yorke terminated the employees who had been recalled in April 1980.

[3] Their names appear in the record as follows: G. Pawlick, Mr. Szafader, Johnnie Miller, Mr. Kopczynski, T. Swienton, Mr. Lakos, and T. A. Valenza.

[4] Pursuant to an order of the bankruptcy court, Yorke paid these employees their wages through February 9, 1980. Yorke did not notify the Union of the shutdown. In fact, Yorke at that time did not know that a union represented Seeburg's employees.

[5] By that time the charge in the instant proceeding had been filed with the Board by the Union.

As stated above, the Administrative Law Judge properly found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to bargain with the Union regarding the effects on unit employees of its decision to terminate operations on February 11, 1980. However, as already indicated, she found that a Transmarine backpay remedy as sought by the General Counsel was not warranted. In this connection, she pointed to the fact that 97 percent of the unit employees had been laid off before Yorke became trustee, that Seeburg had suffered a $350,000 loss during the 4 months before Yorke became trustee, and that Yorke served as trustee for only 1 week before shutting down the plant. In these circumstances, she also relied on the Board's Decision in National Terminal[6] to support her holding that, contrary to the Transmarine line of cases upon which the General Counsel relied, Respondent's failure to bargain about the effects of the closing did not occur at a time when the Union was in a position of economic strength. We find that National Terminal, supra, is inapposite as the employer therein was forced to close "in an almost emergency situation" because of "a calamitous event," namely, the theft of its delivery trucks which made it impossible to continue its operations.[7] In significant contrast, Respondent still had valuable assets at the time of the shutdown and, in fact, found it necessary to recall some employees to operate the business until its sale to another company. Thus, we find, contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, that in the instant case, unlike the situation in National Terminal, supra, a measure of balanced bargaining power existed prior to and at the time of the shutdown. As we held in Burgmeyer Bros., Inc., 254 NLRB 1027 (1981), and the cases cited therein, an employer is not relieved of its obligation to provide backpay in accordance with the Transmarine formula merely because it has become a debtor-in-possession under the Bankruptcy Act and believes that, as a result thereof, it would be financially unable to meet any of the union's bargaining demands.

Accordingly, we shall, in addition to ordering Respondent to bargain with the Union concerning the effects of the shutdown, accompany said Order with a limited backpay requirement for the seven employees who were actively working as of the time of the shutdown. The Union contends that the backpay remedy should also extend to the laid-off employees. We find no merit in this contention as the layoffs were lawfully made pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement of the parties and the Union interposed no objection to them at the time they occurred. However, in view of the employee status of the individuals who were laid off prior to February 4, 1980, we specifically find that the bargaining order extends to them as well as to the employees who worked until the time of the shutdown.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that Respondent cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We shall also order that Respondent bargain with the Union over the effects on its employees of the discontinuance of its operations. It is clear, however, that a bargaining order alone cannot fully remedy the unfair labor practices committed by Respondent because, as a result of Respondent's failure to bargain with the Union about the effects of discontinuing operations, Respondent's employees were denied an opportunity to bargain through their exclusive representative at a time when such bargaining would have been meaningful. Meaningful bargaining cannot now be assured until some measure of economic strength is restored to the Union. Accordingly, in order to effectuate the purposes of the Act, we shall accompany our order to bargain with a limited backpay requirement designed both to make whole the seven employees, who were on the payroll on February 11, 1980, for losses suffered as a result of the violation and to recreate in some practicable manner a situation in which the parties' bargaining position is not entirely devoid of economic consequences for Respondent. We shall do so in this case by requiring Respondent to pay backpay to its employees in a manner similar to that required in Transmarine Navigation Corporation, supra. As in Transmarine, we shall require that the backpay for those employees be not less than the amounts they would have earned during a 2-week period of employment,[8] at the rate of their normal wages when last in Respondent's employ.

Accordingly, we shall order Respondent to bargain upon request with the Union about the effects on its employees of the discontinuance of its operations; and to pay these employees amounts at the rate of their normal wages when last in Respondent's employ from 5 days after the date of this Decision until the occurrence of the earliest of the following conditions: (1) the date Respondent bargains to agreement with the Union on those subjects pertaining to the effects of Respondent's discontinuance of its operations; (2) a bona fide impasse in bargaining; (3) the failure of the Union to request bargaining within 5 days of this Decision, or to commence negotiations within 5 days of Respondent's notice of its desire to bargain with the Union; or (4) the subsequent failure of the Union to bargain in good faith; but in no event shall the sum paid to any of these employees exceed the amount each would have earned as wages from the time Respondent discontinued its operations to the time each secured equivalent employment elsewhere, or the date on which Respondent shall have offered to bargain, whichever occurs first; provided, however, in no event shall this sum be less than such employees would have earned for a 2-week period at the rate of their normal wages when last in Respondent's employ. Backpay shall be based upon earnings which the discharged employees would normally have received during the applicable period, less any net interim earnings, and shall be computed on a quarterly basis in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon computed in the manner provided in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[9]

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

NANCY M. SHERMAN, Administrative Law Judge: This proceeding was heard before me on February 17, 1981, pursuant to a charge filed on February 28, 1980, and amended on June 6 and 12, 1980, and a complaint issued on June 17, 1980, and amended on November 28, 1980. The complaint alleges that Respondent The Seeburg Corporation (herein called Seeburg) and Respondent Seeburg Service Parts Co. (herein called Seeburg Service) constitute a single integrated business enterprise and single and/or joint employer within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. The complaint further alleges that since about February 4, 1980, Respondent Nathan Yorke, who is admittedly trustee in bankruptcy for Seeburg, has had authority to continue operations and exercise all powers necessary to the administration of Seeburg and Seeburg Service. The complaint goes on to allege that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act about February 8, 1980, by terminating operations and discharging employees without prior notice to Local Union 743, Warehouse, Mail Order, Technical and Professional Employees Union, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (herein called the Union), and without having afforded the Union an opportunity to negotiate and bargain concerning the effect of said conduct. An answer to the complaint was filed by counsel for Seeburg and counsel for Yorke, but not by Seeburg Service as such.

At the hearing, appearances were filed on behalf of Yorke and Seeburg, but not on behalf of Seeburg Service as such. On the basis of the entire record, including the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by counsel for Yorke, counsel for the Union, and counsel for the General Counsel, I hereby make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION; THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN SEEBURG AND SEEBURG SERVICE; THE APPROPRIATE UNIT

At all material times until February 8, 1980, Seeburg, a Delaware corporation, has been engaged in the manufacture of jukeboxes and other machinery in Chicago, Illinois. During the calendar year preceding November 28, 1980, a representative period, Seeburg sold and shipped goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside Illinois. At all times material herein, Seeburg Service, a Delaware corporation, has been engaged in the manufacture and/or distribution of parts in Chicago, Illinois. During the calendar year preceding November 28, 1980, a representative period, Seeburg Service sold and shipped goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside Illinois. During the calendar year preceding November 28, 1980, a representative period, Seeburg, Seeburg Service, and Yorke as trustee, in the course of the business operations described above, collectively sold and shipped goods and provided services valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points located outside Illinois. I find that Seeburg and Seeburg Service were at all material times each engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act; and that Respondents collectively were at all material times engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act. Further, I find that the Board's jurisdictional standards are satisfied by the operations of Seeburg, Seeburg Service, and Respondents, collectively.

Seeburg and Seeburg Service are both owned by the same entity; are operated at the same Chicago, Illinois, facility; are run by the same management; purchased goods and services from the same customers; and shipped their products to the same customers. Seeburg Service kept an inventory and filled orders on request for spare parts relating to the finished product that Seeburg sold. All the employees on the Seeburg Service payroll had formerly been on the Seeburg payroll. I find that Seeburg and Seeburg Service constitute a single integrated business enterprise and single and/or joint employer within the meaning of the Act. Sakrete of Northern California, Inc., 137 NLRB 1220 (1962), 140 NLRB 765 (1963), enfd. 332 F.2d 902 (9th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 961 (1965).

In November 1977, Seeburg and the Union entered into a collective-bargaining agreement effective between October 1977 and September 1980, with respect to a unit of "all plant clerical, and all production and maintenance employees of the Company [The Seeburg Products Division of the Seeburg Corporation of Delaware] at its Chicago, Illinois Plant" excluding "executive, supervisory employees, timekeepers, foremen with power to hire and fire or to effectively recommend such action, office clerical employees, guards and professional employees, as defined in the [National Labor Relations Act], as amended." In October 1978, certain employees on Seeburg's payroll were transferred to Seeburg Service's payroll. All of the employees on Seeburg Service's payroll about January 1980 had at one time worked for Seeburg. The terms of the 1977-80 collective-bargaining agreement were applied to the employees on the Seeburg Service payroll. Joseph P. Dillon, Seeburg's treasurer and the chairman of its board, testified that the contract was so applied on a "voluntary basis." However, Dillon further testified that at least some Seeburg Service employees were subject to the arrangement, set forth in the contract, that on an employee's written request, the Employer would deduct union dues from his wages and pay them to the Union. Also, the contract contains a union-shop clause; and all of Seeburg Service's plant clerical, production, and maintenance employees were union members. Sections 8(a)(3) and 302(c)(4) of the Act forbid an employer to pay to a union any membership dues deducted from its employees' wages, and to require union membership as a condition of employment, without a collective-bargaining agreement calling for such action. I conclude that the Seeburg-union agreement covered Seeburg Service's employees. Accordingly, I find that, at all material times herein, the appropriate unit consisted of both Seeburg's and Seeburg Service's employees with the job classifications described in the collective-bargaining agreement.

On February 4, 1980, Yorke was appointed by the United States bankruptcy court to act as Seeburg's trustee in bankruptcy. As shown infra, a few days later he closed down the operations of both Seeburg and Seeburg Service. At the hearing before me, Seeburg's attorney, Neil P. Gantz, stated without disagreement from any party that, in preparing the schedules in the bankruptcy court, he had considered Seeburg Service's assets to be Seeburg assets, "and as it turned out, we agreed later on that [Seeburg Service's assets] were, in fact, part of the assets of the Seeburg Corporation."[1] Gantz further stated, in effect, that parts received from Seeburg Service by various distributors after the filing of Seeburg's petition for reorganization were received by them pursuant to petitions filed with and ruled on by the bankruptcy court. I find that Yorke was the trustee in bankruptcy for both Seeburg and Seeburg Parts. I find that at all material times after February 4, 1980, Yorke has been an employer within the meaning of the Act, and (for reasons stated infra, part II, E) an alter ego of Seeburg and Seeburg Parts.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Before mid-July 1979, Seeburg and Seeburg Service had an active payroll of about 385 or 395 employees. The traditional vacation period was in late July or early August. However, because in 1979 Seeburg had financial or cash flow problems, the vacation period that year began in mid-July; and (although the vacation period ended in mid-August), nobody was called back to work until mid-September. Also, at that time only about 250 unit employees were recalled.

On October 19, 1979, Seeburg filed a petition for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Act. At or about this time, further layoffs were effected, and the complement was reduced to about 150 unit employees. About early January 1980, the complement was again reduced to no more than 60 employees, mostly on Seeburg's payroll. By February 4, 1980, only about seven unit employees were still actively working. Between October 19, 1970, and February 8, 1980, when except for the last 4 days Seeburg was a debtor-in-possession, Seeburg lost about $350,000.

The foregoing recalls and (inferentially) layoffs were effected in accordance with the seniority provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement. The Union never requested bargaining about the matter of the layoffs effected before February 4, 1980.

B. The Appointment of Trustee Yorke; the Shutdown of Operations

On February 4, 1980, the bankruptcy court appointed Yorke to act as trustee in bankruptcy for Seeburg. Yorke testified that his duties as trustee were to investigate Seeburg's financial condition and determine whether Seeburg had operated at a profit while it was a debtor-in-possession, to evaluate Seeburg's assets, and to attempt to file a plan of reorganization on which creditors could vote. He further testified that he assumed that, when he was appointed on February 4, he had full authority to operate Seeburg.

On February 4, 1980, at or about 2 p.m., Yorke paid his first visit to the plant being used by Seeburg and Seeburg Parts. He was accompanied by Attorney Malcolm Gaynor, who represented the creditors' committee, and a man named Greenhouse, who represented Seeburg. During this visit, Yorke saw only the first floor production area, where the lights were turned off and nobody was present, and the office, where he saw only Dillon and a bookkeeper. However, as of that date, about seven unit employees were still on the payroll.

At the first creditors' meeting on February 8, 1980, Dillon told them and Yorke under oath that Seeburg had lost about $350,000 since it filed its October 19 petition, it had about $5,000 in the bank, and it owed Seeburg's employees (unit and nonunit) more than $5,000 in wages.[2] Dillon further stated that Seeburg was on a secured-lending basis with the Chase Manhattan Bank, all of Seeburg's receivables and inventory were pledged to Chase in return for periodic loans to Seeburg, and Chase had joined with other creditors in the petition to appoint a trustee. As of that date, Seeburg's liabilities exceeded $8 million and the book value of its assets approximated $6 million; when liquidated, its assets amounted to about $1.5 million.

Yorke testified that, as trustee, he had the power to continue the business in operation without the approval of the bankruptcy court. He further testified that he sought an order to shut it down. On an undisclosed date between the close of the creditors' meeting on Friday, February 8, and the issuance of an order of the bankruptcy court on Monday, February 11, Yorke filed a motion, which is not in the record before me, with that court. On February 11, 1980, the bankruptcy court issued an "Order Authorizing Trustee to Curtail Operations of the Debtor," which stated, in part:

[1] Gantz stated that he had believed until late 1979 or January 1980 that Seeburg Service was a subsidiary of Seeburg rather than, as it in fact was, a subsidiary of the same corporation which owned Seeburg. When the real corporate relationship was ascertained, separate bank accounts and payrolls were established. The Seeburg Service accounts were controlled by Seeburg Treasurer Dillon. The record fails to show what other role, if any, he played in managing Seeburg Service.

[2] They had been paid through February 2, 1980, but not for work performed thereafter. Dillon had control of a separate fund sufficient to meet the payroll of Seeburg Service (see supra, fn. 1).

> THIS CAUSE coming on to be heard on the application of Nathan Yorke, trustee in bankruptcy, for authority to curtail the debtor's operations; due written notice having been given to all parties entitled thereto and the court being fully advised in the premises, it appearing that continued operations of the debtor in a manner similar to that which has been followed since the initiation of these proceedings, would be unprofitable and counter-productive to the instant reorganization proceeding;
> IT IS ORDERED that Nathan Yorke, trustee in bankruptcy, be and he hereby is, authorized to curtail the debtor's operations by:
> > (a) Terminating all personnel save certain key individuals who will be retained for services the trustee deems necessary in furtherance of the instant reorganization.

C. The Shutdown Without Notice to the Union

Yorke received this order the day it was issued, February 11. That same day, he shut down the plant facility being used by both Seeburg and Seeburg Service, and released all the personnel, including about seven unit employees. Yorke did not, before taking this action, give any notice to the Union that such action was contemplated.[3] He credibly testified that, when he took this action, he did not know that a union represented Seeburg's employees: ". . . the only one I spoke to was Mr. Dillon, and he didn't advise me of it."

D. Events After the February 11, 1980, Shutdown

1. The February 1980 correspondence between the Union and Yorke

On February 15, 1980, Union Attorney Edwin H. Benn sent virtually identical letters to Yorke and to Seeburg which read in part as follows:

> The undersigned represents Local 743, I.B.T. The Union has a collective bargaining agreement covering the employees of Seeburg Corporation.
> . . . It has also come to our attention that the remaining employees of Seeburg Corp. have been locked out as of February 11, 1980.
>
> This is also to demand that an immediate meeting be set up so that we can discuss the decision and effects that your action has on our bargaining unit employees.

The letters went on to inquire the identity of the shareholders of Seeburg, X Cor International, Inc., and Choice Vend, Inc., and asked a number of other questions which answers would tend to show whether these three corporations were interrelated in a manner which might impose duties on X Cor and/or Choice Vend with respect to employees on Seeburg's payroll.[4] Further, the letters asked for the names and addresses of any prospective purchasers of Seeburg. The letters concluded:

> Please be advised that we expect our collective bargaining agreement to be abided by and we expect a response to this letter by close of business February 22, 1980. Failure to answer this letter by the time indicated will necessitate the institution of the proper proceeding.

Seeburg, as such, never answered this letter. Yorke's reply is dated February 25, 1980, and reads in its entirety:

> I am in receipt of your letter dated February 15, 1980. Please be advised that the undersigned was appointed Trustee on February 4, 1980. Be further advised that the Trustee discontinued the operation of the business and has no employees.
> In reply to your questions, Excor [sic] is a publicly owned company. Consolidated Entertainment owns all the stock of the Seeburg Corporation. I do not know who owns Choice Vend. I do not know if Choice Vend or Excor have any collective bargaining agreements with labor organizations.
> If there is any further information you desire, I will be happy to furnish same.

Benn filed the initial charges herein on February 28, 1980, and made no further attempt to get in touch with Yorke. Meanwhile, on February 19, Yorke received about $6,000, apparently constituting all of Seeburg's cash on hand, which moneys, pursuant to an order of the bankruptcy court, he used on February 25 to pay the Seeburg employees' wages for periods through Saturday, February 9, 2 days before the terminations.

[3] One of the laid-off employees was the union steward. No contention is made that whatever notice he received of his own layoff constituted legally adequate notice to the Union that the operation had been shut down.

[4] The June 1980 initial complaint herein alleges, inter alia, that "Respondent X Cor, Respondent Seeburg, Respondent Choice [Vend], Respondent Yorke, . . . Respondent Seeburg Service" and other corporations were a single employer, a joint employer, or alter egos; and that Yorke was a successor in bankruptcy to Seeburg and/or the other corporations. The June 1980 complaint also includes allegations that all the respondents named therein had violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) when Choice Vend transferred unit work to Windsor Locks, Connecticut, from the Chicago plant involved herein, and discharged Chicago employees, without prior notice to the Union and without affording the Union an opportunity to negotiate regarding the decision to transfer and its effects. Prior to the hearing before me, the case was apparently settled with respect to X Cor, Choice Vend, and the other corporations named in the June 1980 complaint but not in the November 1980 complaint before me.

2. Arrangements made between the Union and Yorke to recall a few employees

Thereafter, the bankruptcy court authorized Yorke to offer some parts for sale.[5] During an early April 1980 conference initiated by Yorke and Dillon, they discussed with Union Representative Harry Peters a plan to recall two or three unit employees to assist in the sale of the parts. Later, Peters telephoned Yorke that Peters would commit York and Dillon to recall certain individuals, and they were in fact recalled. Yorke and/or Dillon asked Peters for a letter authorizing this recall, and he sent that letter.

3. Yorke's efforts to reject the bargaining agreement

On an undisclosed date after February 15, Yorke filed with the bankruptcy court an application to reject the collective-bargaining agreement. This application was opposed by both the Union and the Board, and was subsequently withdrawn. However, the contract was eventually rejected under the specific terms of the plan of arrangement eventually approved by the bankruptcy court on July 28, 1980.

4. The July 22, 1980, settlement meeting

After the issuance of the original complaint herein, Gaynor, the attorney for the creditors' committee, telephoned Union Attorney Benn and requested a meeting. Benn told Gaynor that "we could discuss the charges, the complaint, and hopefully settlement." During this meeting, which was held on July 22, 1980, Gaynor made an unsuccessful effort to induce the Union to withdraw its unfair labor practice charges. At the hearing and in post-hearing briefs, the General Counsel and union counsel requested me to disregard the evidence about what was said during this July 22 meeting, on the ground that it constituted "compromise negotiations" within the meaning of Rule 408 of the Federal Rules of Evidence. I conclude that their position in this respect is well taken.[6]

5. Bankruptcy court proceedings

July 28, 1980, the bankruptcy court ruled that the backpay claimed by the Board as due in the instant proceedings was an administrative expense entitled to priority order under Section 507(a)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code. Seeburg Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 105 LRRM 3050, 5 B.R. 364.[7] As of that date, the Board had modified its proof of claim so as to total $55,000. Also on July 28, the bankruptcy court approved a reorganization plan under which Seeburg and its purchaser-in-liquidation, Stern Electronics, Inc., agreed to set aside $49,000 of the estate's assets should a finding of backpay liability ultimately be made. Stern Electronics agreed to commit to cover the remaining $6,000 of the potential liability. Seeburg, supra, 105 LRRM at 3356.

The July 25, 1980, hearing on confirmation before the bankruptcy court was attended by, inter alia, Attorney William G. Kocol on behalf of the NLRB, Benn on the Union's behalf, Gaynor on behalf of the creditors' committee, Attorney Joseph Matz on Seeburg's behalf, and Yorke. Matz stated on the record that, following the bankruptcy court's order confirming the plan of arrangement, there would be a closing as provided for in the contract, and Seeburg's assets would be transferred in due course to Stern. Matz went on to say that as of that moment there would be no more need for Yorke to maintain any operation whatsoever, that he would be terminating the remaining employees, and that he had told Matz that three of these employees were union employees. Gaynor said that, if the Union wanted Yorke to bargain with respect to the effect of what he was doing pursuant to the plan and in the order of confirmation, "he is here and we would be glad to do such bargaining in open court. . . . I think we should do this first." The bankruptcy judge said that he would not attend bargaining, but his courtroom could be used for that purpose. Benn said that the Union would be more than happy to sit down with Yorke immediately, but might be unable to do so that day because the Union's bargaining representative, Business Agent Peters, was not there. Gaynor said that he wanted a stenographic record of the bargaining. Benn said that "the Labor Board has held repeatedly that is unlawful [cf., infra, fn. 10]. It takes away from the give and take of what happens at the bargaining table . . . I am happy [Gaynor] recognizes his right as of this point to let the bargainers do whatever they want to do." Gaynor said that there should be a stenographic record: "There is no give and take because there is nothing that Mr. Yorke has to give." The bankruptcy judge said, "Mr. Gaynor, we have the record here. You have made it very clear. This stenographic reporter is available. You have made your offer to negotiate, counsel has responded."

6. The late August discussions

By letter to Yorke dated July 31, 1980, Union Attorney Benn demanded that negotiations commence immediately "concerning the effects of the final phase out of the Seeburg operation which was accomplished July 28, 1980." In consequence of this letter, a late August 1980 meeting was held between Seeburg Attorney Gantz, the creditors' committee attorneys, Gaynor and Gettleman, Union Attorney Benn, Union Representative Peters, and Yorke. Benn asked how many employees had been on the Seeburg payroll as of February 1980. Gantz said seven. Benn asked for their names, wage rates, and classifications, and Gantz said he would get that information for Benn. There is no claim that Gantz failed to do so.

[5] The record fails to show whether these parts were owned by Seeburg or by Seeburg Parts. See supra, part I.

[6] Rule 408 is applicable to compromise offers made by a party to the litigation to a nonparty. 2 Weinstein's Evidence para. 408[01], p. 408–413 (1980). Accordingly, I need not and do not consider whether Yorke's status as a party hereto rendered the creditors' committee a party also. Yorke Exh. 1, a July 23, 1980, letter from Benn to Gaynor purporting to summarize the July 22 meeting, was offered by the General Counsel, and received in evidence, solely for the purpose of showing that the July 22 meeting was a settlement discussion.

[7] The court also granted the request of Seeburg, Yorke, and the creditors' committee for an order enjoining the Board from processing the instant unfair labor practice case, which the court said would be disposed of by the court itself. On November 13, 1980, the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois vacated the bankruptcy judge's order, and directed him to refrain from hearing the unfair labor practice charges. (105 LRRM 3355.)

Benn said that 300 or 400 people had been on layoff status when Seeburg filed its October 1979 petition, and asked whether Yorke could obtain jobs for them with Stern Electronics, the purchaser in liquidation. Yorke replied that he had no control over Stern. He said that letters of reference would be furnished to these employees, but no such letters were ever furnished. Benn asked if payments to the pension plan were current. He was told that they were, and accepted this representation. Benn asked whether payments had been made to the hospitalization insurance carrier. Gantz said that a claim for the premiums had been filed by the carrier, there was going to be no objection, the bankruptcy court was going to allow it, and employees would thereby obtain coverage for that period of time.

Benn said that he would like to discuss severance pay. Gaynor and Yorke told him to show some authority where Yorke could give severance pay. Benn said that the bankruptcy court had set aside $55,000 and had determined that it would "come off the top" as a cost of administration; that the Labor Board settlement, if agreed to, would amount to $7,000 or $8,000; and that the remainder could be distributed among the 400 employees (aside from the 7 retained on the payroll) as severance pay. Gaynor and Yorke said that they did not know under what section of the Bankruptcy Act Yorke would be able to make such a distribution, that these 300 or 400 employees whose jobs had been terminated in October 1979 had filed no claims in the bankruptcy proceedings, and that the time had expired for them to file such claims. Benn said that he was not talking about the Bankruptcy Code, that he was talking about obligations under the National Labor Relations Act and the duty to bargain about effects. Yorke said that he did not operate under the labor laws, he operated under the Bankruptcy Act.

Gaynor said that, as to the Labor Board case, the Government had a "bullshit case," and that Benn and NLRB Attorney Kocol had conspired to file a fraudulent claim. Benn suggested that Gaynor tell this to the bankruptcy court judge. Benn said that he had heard from Kocol that there were discussions concerning settlement of the Labor Board case. Gaynor said that he would not settle the Labor Board case. Benn said that someone should tell that to Kocol, because Benn felt that Kocol was "being led down the path." Gaynor replied, "they only listened to the Labor Board's offer, they were not going to settle it." Gaynor then asked Benn whether "we had bargained." Benn replied, "I suppose that remains to be seen at a later date." Nobody suggested a future meeting.[8]

E. Analysis and Conclusions

When an employer decides to terminate or close its entire operation it must, once that decision is made, afford the employees' collective-bargaining representative the opportunity to bargain over the impact and effect of that decision on unit employees. Burgmeyer Bros., Inc., 254 NLRB 1027 (1981); Summit Tooling Co., 195 NLRB 479 (1972), enfd. 474 F.2d 1352 (7th Cir. 1973). This duty is not relieved by the employer's bankruptcy, and any consequent belief by it that it would be financially unable to meet any of the union's bargaining demands. Burgmeyer, supra. A trustee-in-bankruptcy is the alter ego of the bankrupt employer and, like that employer, is under a duty to comply with the National Labor Relations Act, including the requirement to engage in collective bargaining. Jersey Juniors, Inc., 230 NLRB 329, 331–332 (1977); Burgmeyer, supra.

Immediately after the General Counsel and the Union had rested, counsel for Respondent Yorke admitted the truth of the complaint allegation that, about February 8, 1980, Respondents terminated operations, and discharged the employees, without prior notice to the Union and without having afforded the Union an opportunity to negotiate regarding the effect of such conduct. Moreover, the record as a whole establishes that on February 11, 1980, Respondents in fact did this. The foregoing establishes, at least prima facie, that Respondents thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Respondent Yorke defends his own failure to give the Union such notice on the ground that, when he shut down the plant, he did not know that the employees had a collective-bargaining representative. Because Seeburg and Seeburg Parts obviously did know, I doubt the legal sufficiency of Yorke's defense in this respect. See N.L.R.B. v. E.D.S. Service Co., 466 F.2d 157 (9th Cir. 1972); Jersey Juniors, supra, 230 NLRB at 331–332; N.L.R.B. v. Albuquerque Phoenix Express, 368 F.2d 451, 452–453 (10th Cir. 1966).

In any event, Yorke failed to bargain with the Union about the shutdown's effect on employees even after it found out about the shutdown and made a written "demand that an immediate meeting be set up so that we can discuss the . . . effects that your action has on our bargaining unit employees." Yorke's written response did not refer to the request for a meeting, but merely said that he had discontinued the operation of the business and had no employees, gave some of the information requested by the Union regarding corporations allegedly related to Seeburg, and said that he would be happy to furnish further information.[9] Furthermore, during the

[8] My findings as to what was said during this late August meeting are based mostly on the testimony of Union Attorney Benn, who was called as a witness by Respondent Yorke. I perceive no basis in Benn's credible testimony for his statement, at the end of his direct testimony, that "the entire meeting was settlement." A finding that at least part of this meeting constituted a settlement discussion would be warranted were I to credit Yorke's testimony that Gaynor said "he wouldn't suggest settling with the National Labor Relations Board unless the Union was a party to it . . . because that would leave the Union as an open end to the agreement." However, such testimony is inconsistent with Benn's credible testimony regarding Gaynor's expressed position, Yorke's counsel makes no contention that Benn's testimony varied from his contemporaneous notes (which he supplied to Yorke's counsel), and Yorke's testimony as a whole shows that he had a poor memory. Accordingly, I do not accept the testimony of Yorke summarized in this footnote. Hence, I perceive no credible factual predicate for Benn's contention, not renewed in his brief, that evidence as to the late August meeting is inadmissible under Fed. R. Evid. 408 as "statements made in compromise negotiations."

[9] Yorke's counsel stated at the outset of the hearing that the Union's letter included a request that Yorke "bargain about the effects of" the closing. I agree, and do not accept counsel's contention, in his post-hearing brief, that this letter was "ambiguous." See Hankamer Ready Mix Concrete Co., 234 NLRB 608, 615 (1978); Richmond, Division of Pak-Well, 206 NLRB 260, 261 (1973). Moreover, I find that Yorke's failure to

July 25, 1980, bankruptcy court session, Yorke remained silent when the attorney for the creditors' committee stated that there could be no give and take in bargaining because Yorke had nothing to give, and when Gaynor adhered to his insistence on a stenographic transcript of any bargaining sessions, notwithstanding Benn's statement that the Union would exercise its right to commence negotiations without a stenographer.[10] Indeed, at the hearing before me, Yorke attributed to himself some of the remarks which the bankruptcy court transcript shows were in fact made by Gaynor. Finally, when in August 1980 the Union asked Yorke to discuss severance pay, Yorke said that he had no authority under the Bankruptcy Act to make such payments and that he operated under that Act and not the labor laws. Indeed, York did not even keep the promise which he gave during that meeting, after he was asked about obtaining jobs for the employees with Stern, to furnish the employees with letters of reference.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. At all material times until February 8, 1980, The Seeburg Corporation was engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. At all material times herein, Seeburg Service Parts Corporation was engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

3. At all material times herein, The Seeburg Corporation, Seeburg Service Parts Corporation, and Nathan Yorke, Trustee in Bankruptcy, collectively, were engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

4. At all material times herein, The Seeburg Corporation and Seeburg Service Parts Corporation have constituted a single integrated business enterprise and single and/or joint employer within the meaning of the Act.

5. At all material times on and after February 4, 1980, Yorke has been the trustee in bankruptcy for The Seeburg Corporation and Seeburg Service Parts Corporation, and an employer within the meaning of Section 2(1) and (2) of the Act.

6. At all material times on and after February 4, 1980, Yorke has occupied alter ego status with respect to The Seeburg Corporation and Seeburg Parts Corporation.

7. The following employees of The Seeburg Corporation, Seeburg Service Parts Corporation, and/or Yorke, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All plant clerical and all production and maintenance employees at the Chicago, Illinois, plant, excluding executive, supervisory employees, timekeepers, foremen with power to hire and fire or to effectively recommend such action, office clerical employees, guards and professional employees as defined in the Act.

8. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

9. By virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, the Union has been at all material times and still is the exclusive representative of the unit described in Conclusion of Law 7.

On February 11, 1980, The Seeburg Corporation, Seeburg Service Parts, and Yorke terminated operations at the Chicago, Illinois, facility, and discharged the employees at that facility, without prior notice to the Union and without having afforded the Union an opportunity to negotiate and bargain concerning the effects of such conduct on unit employees.

11. By engaging in the conduct described in Conclusion of Law 10, The Seeburg Corporation, Seeburg Service Parts, and Yorke engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, which unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents have violated the Act in certain respects, I shall recommend that Respondents be required to cease and desist therefrom. Affirmatively, Respondents will be required to bargain with the Union, upon request, with respect to the effects on employees of the decision to terminate operations, and to mail appropriate notices.

I agree with Respondent that under National Terminal Baking Corp., a Subsidiary of Kosher Kitchens, 190 NLRB 465 (1971), no backpay order should issue here. Although it is unclear just when Yorke reached his decision to ask the bankruptcy court for permission to shut down the plant, 97 percent of the unit employees had been laid off before he became trustee, Seeburg had lost $350,000 during the 4 months before he became trustee, and Yorke had been trustee for only a week before receiving and acting on permission to shut down the plant. Under these circumstances, as in National Terminal, Respondents' failure to bargain about effects did not occur at a time when the Union was in a position of economic strength. The backpay orders in the cases cited by the General Counsel and the Union constituted efforts to assure meaningful bargaining by restoring such strength in situations where, if the employer had timely complied with its duty to bargain about effects, the union could have imposed some economic pressure to compel the employer to accede to the union's demands.[11]

The Union requests an order affording it "bargaining expenses, attorneys' fees and other costs" on the ground that because "the Respondent [sic] has admittedly stated that it purposely refused to acknowledge its obligations under the Act, it is apparent that the defenses raised are patently frivolous." In further support of this contention, the Union alleges that the unfair labor practices in this case are "flagrant" and that it was "required to participate" in "many forays . . . in Respondent's [sic] actions in the bankruptcy court seeking injunctive relief against the Board proceedings." To the extent that the Union is requesting its costs in the proceedings before the bankruptcy court and the district court, the Union's request should be directed to those courts and not to me. Further, Board precedent points to the denial of "costs" in connection with the instant litigation before the agency itself, because a major issue in this case is whether a backpay order should issue and, if so, to whom; and as to this issue, I have found Yorke's position not only nonfrivolous, but warranted. See Heck's, Inc., 215 NLRB 765 (1974); Wellman Industries, Inc., 248 NLRB 325 (1980). Indeed, I note that, although the General Counsel and the Union both seek a backpay order, they disagree between themselves as to whether the beneficiaries should include the employees on layoff before the shutdown.

Upon the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[12]

Respondents Nathan Yorke, Trustee in Bankruptcy; The Seeburg Corporation; Seeburg Service Parts Corporation; their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from failing to bargain with Local Union 743, Warehouse, Mail Order, Technical and Professional Employees Union, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, about the effect, on employees in the following unit, of the decision to terminate operations on February 11, 1980:

> All plant clerical, and all production and maintenance employees on the payroll of The Seeburg Corporation and Seeburg Service Parts Corporation at the Chicago, Illinois, plant, excluding executive, supervisory employees, timekeepers, foremen with power to hire and fire or to effectively recommend such action, office clerical employees, guards and professional employees as defined in the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization with respect to the effect on employees in the above-described unit of the decision to terminate operations on February 11, 1980, and reduce to writing any agreement reached as a result of such bargaining.

(b) Mail a copy of the attached notice marked "Appendix"[13] to each employee in the appropriate unit (whether actively working or on layoff status) as of February 11, 1980. Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 13, after being duly signed by Respondents' authorized representatives, shall be mailed immediately upon receipt thereof.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 13, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondents have taken to comply herewith.

[12] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[13] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

December 28, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

Upon a petition duly filed under Section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, a hearing was held on various dates from January 16 to January 29, 1981, before Hearing Officer Bruce D. Bagley. Following the hearing and pursuant to Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations and Statements of Procedure, Series 8, as amended, and by direction of the Regional Director for Region 4, this case was transferred to the National Labor Relations Board for decision. Thereafter, the Employer and the Petitioner filed briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the Hearing Officer's rulings made at the hearing and finds no prejudicial error was committed. The rulings are hereby affirmed.

Upon the entire record in this case, including the briefs of the parties, the Board finds:

1. The Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act, and it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

2. The labor organization involved claims to represent certain employees of the Employer.

3. No question affecting commerce exists concerning the representation of employees of the Employer within the meaning of Sections 9(c)(1) and 2(6) and (7) of the Act, for the following reasons:

Bally's Park Place, Inc., is a New Jersey corporation engaged in operating a hotel and casino in Atlantic City, New Jersey.

The Petitioner seeks to represent separate units of count room employees, one for "hard count" and one for "soft count," or, though not its primary choice, a single unit of hard and soft count team employees. The Employer contends that the only appropriate unit would consist of its casino accounting department. It urges the units sought by the Petitioner as patently inappropriate and requiring dismissal of the petition. There is no history of bargaining for these employees.

The Employer opened its hotel-casino in December 1979. It employs approximately 800 dealers and 77 slot attendants and mechanics. The casino accounting department employs approximately 331 employees, of whom 40 are "soft count" and 25 are "hard count." Other classifications in this department include slot booth cashiers, runway cashiers, change persons, pit clerks, and income control clerks. Within the casino accounting department is an area designated as the "cage." Individuals who work in the cage are classified as casino cage cashiers, slot cage cashiers, CRT (cathode ray terminal) operators, credit and collection clerks, and the hard and soft count employees here sought. The casino accounting department handles and accounts for all coins and currency passing through the casino, whether through the numerous table games or the slot machines.

The hard count operation includes members, count leads, count mechanics, and count accountants. The hard count team is responsible for collecting the coins deposited each day in the casino's 1,600 slot machines. They are required by law to wear jump suits with no pockets, and they work a single shift each day, commencing at 6 a.m., and continuing until the coins are counted, which may be as early as 10 a.m., or as late as 4:30 p.m. Their average workweek is 30 to 35 hours. Each is required to be licensed by the New Jersey Casino Commission. Their work begins on the casino floor by emptying the coin buckets from the slot machines. The coin-laden buckets then move up a ramp, by tow motors, to the hard count room. There the coins are counted and wrapped, behind locked doors as prescribed by state law, in the presence of an inspector from the Control Commission. At the end of the count, before the hard count team leaves, a slot cage cashier comes to verify the total figures and to "buy off" the coins. Thereafter the coins are the responsibility of the slot cage until again distributed to the various slot booths and slot cashiers throughout the casino.

The hard count mechanics are literally mechanics. While the count is underway, they service the machines-the coin counters and the coin-wrapping machinery in hard count. They also service the coin-counting machines in soft count, and the bill-counting machines used in the casino cage and the soft count room.

The soft count operation occurs twice a day, at 9 a.m. and at 9 p.m., to count and total the currency from the game tables. Soft count employees are required by law to wear smocks. In the presence of a casino cage cashier, the currency is sorted by denomination, properly stacked with pictures facing the same direction, and totaled.

To work on the hard and the soft count teams requires no special training or education, and state licensing of casino employees is not limited to these two teams. All casino accounting department employees have a common payday, as well as the same holidays, vacations, work rules, seniority system, and life and health insurance benefits. All are hourly paid and entitled to use the cafeteria without cost. Each team has a supervisor who may recommend, but not give, wage increases, nor hire, discharge, or discipline without prior approval. Controller Manupelli is in direct charge of the casino accounting department, with the casino cage manager and the casino controller reporting to him. They in turn are superior to the team supervisors.

On the foregoing facts and the entire record here, we find no basis on which to conclude that the two units sought by the Petitioner, either separately or combined, constitute a unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining.[1] The duties of these hard and soft count employees require no specific skill. No formal training is provided and the work is clearly routine and repetitive. That these employees work on shifts that vary from those of other casino accounting department employees furnishes no basis for separate representation, nor does the fact that they are isolated for security reasons from most other employees in their department while carrying out their daily counting of coins and currency. When not working they are free to contact other employees on the premises, with whom they share the same employee benefits. Accordingly, we find that separate units of hard count and of soft count employees are not appropriate, nor is a combined unit of the two teams appropriate, for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

Accordingly, we shall dismiss the petition.

ORDER

It is hereby ordered that the petition filed herein be, and it hereby is, dismissed.

DECISION AND DIRECTION

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On April 7, 1981, Hearing Officer Ruben R. Armendariz issued a report recommending disposition of challenges and objections to the elections held on December 23, 1980.[1]

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and briefs, and hereby adopts the Hearing Officer's findings and recommendations, as modified below.[2]

As noted above, the tally of ballots reveals that 17 ballots were challenged during the election involving Service Employees International Union, Local 706, AFL-CIO. These challenges included challenges by the Employer to the ballots cast by Marilyn Kimmey, Susan Breaux, Carol Garcia, Glennie Bailey, Jill Benoit, and Nora Varando. In his Report and Recommendations on Objections and Challenges, the Hearing Officer, finding that these individuals were employed as casual employees, sustained the challenges to their ballots.[3] Petitioner filed timely exceptions to the Hearing Officer's report, contending that five of the individuals named above were regular employees and the challenges to their ballots should be overruled.[4] The Hearing Officer based the finding that the employees were casual employees on two facts: first, the employees are not required to work a specific schedule of hours but rather have the discretion to accept or reject assignments without discipline; and, second, the individuals in question do not accrue benefits by longevity as do the regular part-time employees.

We have held in the past that the ability to reject work when offered and the receipt of identical benefits are not determinative of an individual's employment status so as to exclude the individual from the unit as a casual employee. Leaders-Nameoki, Inc., 237 NLRB 1269 (1978), and F. P. Packaging, Inc., 236 NLRB 239 (1978). Rather, the individual's relationship to the job must be examined: whether the employee performs unit work and whether the employer has a sufficient regularity of work to demonstrate a community of interest with the remaining employees in the unit regarding wages, hours, and working conditions. System Auto Park & Garages, Inc., 248 NLRB 948 (1980), and F. P. Packaging, supra. In the instant case, the record reveals that the employees in question worked a substantial number of hours on a regular basis and performed the same work under the same conditions and supervision as other unit employees. Thus, these individuals have a substantial community of interest with the other members of the unit regarding wages, hours, and working conditions. We conclude, therefore, that Kimmey, Breaux, Garcia, Bailey, and Varando were, at the time of the December 23, 1980, election, regular part-time employees eligible to vote in the election, and we shall overrule the challenges to their ballots. Accordingly, we shall order the Regional Director to open and count the ballots of Marilyn Kimmey, Susan Breaux, Carol Garcia, Glennie Bailey, and Nora Varando. In his report, the Hearing Officer also found that the Employer, through Supervisor Barbara Roberts, engaged in coercive interrogation

[1] The elections were conducted pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election. The tallies of ballots show the following results:

> Unit "A"—Professional Employees (the Inclusion Question): 10 for and 8 votes against inclusion with non-professional employees; there was 1 challenged ballot, which is insufficient to affect the results on the inclusion question.
> Unit "B"—Professional and Non-Professional Employees: 82 for and 87 votes against the Petitioner; and there were 17 challenged ballots, a sufficient number to affect the results.

[2] The Employer and the Petitioner have excepted to various credibility findings of the Hearing Officer. It is the established policy of the Board not to overrule a hearing officer's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. The Coca-Cola Bottling Company of Memphis, 132 NLRB 481, 483 (1961), and Stretch-Tex Co., 118 NLRB 1359, 1361 (1957). We find insufficient basis for disturbing the credibility resolutions in this case.

[3] In support of the Hearing Officer's finding that six employees should be excluded from the unit, the Employer further contends that the employees in question are not covered by the stipulation, defining the appropriate unit, which was entered into by the parties and approved by the Regional Director. It is well-established Board law that, in stipulated unit cases, the Board's function is to ascertain the parties' intent with regard to the disputed employees and then to determine whether such intent is inconsistent with any statutory provision or established Board policy. The Tribune Company, 190 NLRB 398 (1971). In the instant case, the stipulation clearly enumerates that "regularly scheduled part-time employees" in various positions are to be included in the unit. On its face, the stipulation thus includes those part-time employees who work according to a regular schedule. The Employer contends that the employees in question do not fall within the terms of the stipulation because they are not required to work according to a regular schedule. Contrary to the Employer's contention, however, the record indicates that the employees in question regularly receive a schedule of when they are to work for at least some of their hours. The fact that they may refuse to work the scheduled hours or may be called in to work on days they are not scheduled does not outweight the fact that a portion of their hours are worked according to a schedule. We therefore conclude that the intent of the parties, as evidenced by the stipulation on its face, was to include the employees in question in the unit.

[4] In the absence of exceptions thereto, we adopt pro forma the Hearing Officer's recommendation that the challenge to the ballot of Jill Benoit be sustained.

of employee Cheryl Shockey. The Employer excepted to the Hearing Officer's conclusion that these acts interfered with the conduct of the election and therefore the election should be set aside. We agree with the Hearing Officer. In so doing, however, we rely not only on the above-noted misconduct of Supervisor Roberts, but also on the fact that, based on the credited testimony of Shockey, Supervisor Roberts engaged in additional misconduct. This misconduct occurred at a meeting of the entire department, held by Roberts, during which she stated that, if the Union won the election, the employees would have to start punching a timeclock and take breaks at certain specified times during the day. These remarks—directed to the entire department—constituted a threatened loss of privileges and changes in working conditions in the event of a union victory. This conduct, together with the coercive interrogation of Shockey, clearly warrants setting aside the election and directing that a second election be held, if Petitioner fails to receive a majority of the valid ballots cast in the election conducted on December 23, 1980.

DIRECTION

It is hereby directed that the Regional Director for Region 23, pursuant to the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, within 10 days from the date of this Decision and Direction, open and count the ballots of:

Terrance Barcus
Marilyn Kimmey
Susan Breaux
David Hodgson
Gail Landry
Betty Sedtal
Carol Garcia
Addie May Murphy
Mary Newton
Glennie Bailey
Timmy Williams

and, thereafter, prepare and cause to be served on the parties a revised tally of ballots, including therein the count of said ballots. In the event that the revised tally of ballots shows that Petitioner has received a majority of the valid ballots cast, the Regional Director shall issue the appropriate certification of representative.

In the event that the revised tally of ballots shows that Petitioner has not received a majority of the valid ballots cast, a second election by secret ballot shall be conducted among the employees in the unit found appropriate, at such time as the Regional Director deems appropriate. The Regional Director for Region 23 shall direct and supervise the election, subject to the Board's rules. Eligible to vote are those in the unit who were employed during the payroll period ending immediately before the date of issuance of the Notice of Second Election, including employees who did not work during that period because they were ill, on vacation, or temporarily laid off. Also eligible are employees engaged in an economic strike which commenced less than 12 months before the election date and who retained their status as such during the eligibility period and their replacements. Those in the military services of the United States may vote if they appear in person at the polls. Ineligible to vote are employees who have quit or been discharged for cause since the designated payroll period and employees engaged in a strike who have been discharged for cause since the commencement thereof, and who have not been rehired or reinstated before the election date, and employees engaged in an economic strike which commenced more than 12 months before the election date and who have permanently replaced.[5] Those eligible shall vote whether or not they desire to be represented for collective-bargaining purposes by Service Employees International Union, Local 706, AFL-CIO.

December 29, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Jenkins, Zimmerman, and Hunter

On July 15, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Almira A. Stevenson issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent filed an answering brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the complaint herein be, and it hereby is, dimissed in its entirety.

---

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Almira Abbot Stevenson, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard in Odessa, Texas, on April 14-16, 1981. The charge and amended charge were served on the Respondent on or about July 14 and August 11, 1980, respectively. The complaint was issued August 29, 1980, and was duly answered by the Respondent.

The issues are whether or not the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by promising an employee a promotion if he discontinued his activities on behalf of the Union and threatening employees for engaging in union activities; violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by unilaterally discontinuing the issuance of work gloves; and violated Section 8(a)(3) by discharging Joe Ross.[1] For the reasons given below I recommend that the complaint be dismissed.

Upon the entire record, my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent,[2] I make the following:

Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law[3]

I. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The Respondent is engaged, at its Odessa, Texas, plant involved in this proceeding, in coating pipe for the oil-drilling industry. Its operations consist of a tube shop which is more or less an assembly-line type procedure; a custom shop where pipe and joints are cleaned and coated by hand; and a yard used mainly for storage. The employee complement is approximately 50. At material times, John Lubke was vice president of the western zone; William Anderson was Odessa area manager; Gary Richardson was plant manager; Dan Chew was custom shop section manager (foreman of the custom shop); and Dan Rimmer was operations manager of the yard department (foreman of the yard). I find that these individuals were supervisors and agents of the Respondent.

In a previous case involving the same parties, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order dated March 14, 1980,[4] finding that the Respondent and the Union were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement effective from November 15, 1975, through November 15, 1978, covering the following appropriate unit, for which the International Union was certified in 1966:

> All production and maintenance employees employed in the maintenance, yard, custom, and tube departments by the Company at its plant located at 300 W. 61st Street in Odessa, Texas, excluding all other employees including administrative, estimating, sales, engineering, purchasing, office, technical, payroll, quality control, inspection and reclamation employees, and all foremen, guards, watchmen and supervisors as defined in the Act.

In its Decision and Order, the Board concluded that the Respondent committed the following unfair labor practices:

(1) Violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act: Plant Manager Gary Richardson, in July or August 1978, promised Union Committeeman Keith Eddings that the Respondent would give employee bonuses if the Odessa plant went nonunion, in early October 1978 promised to give employee Lee Shearman a promotion and a pay raise if he would get out of the Union, on or about November

---

[1] No issue is presented with respect to jurisdiction or labor organization status. Based on the allegations of the complaint and the admissions of the answer, I find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within Sec. 2(6) and (7), and that the Charging Party Union is a labor organization within Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

[2] Certain errors in the transcript are hereby noted and corrected.

259 NLRB No. 111

11, 1978, promulgated to Union Committeeman Eddings an overly broad no-solicitation rule, and, on November 21, 1978, threatened Eddings that the Respondent would withdraw announced wage increases if the employees continued to fight for the Union; (2) violations of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act: on and after November 9, 1978, refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union in the appropriate unit, and on November 21, 1978, announcing unilaterally determined wage increases to the bargaining unit employees. The Respondent has apparently taken no action to comply with the Board's Order in that case which is pending before the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

B. Alleged Violations of Section 8(a)(1)

The complaint alleges in effect and the answer denies that, in February 1980, Plant Manager Gary Richardson promised employee L. B. Whiteside a promotion if he discontinued his activities on behalf of the Union; and on or about August 4, 1980, Yard Foreman Don Rimmer informed Whiteside that he could not be promoted because of the Union and that Rimmer had been assigned to the yard department "to get rid of all the niggers and old hands" and then the Company would be rid of the Union.

L. B. Whiteside, a black, has been employed by the Respondent 15 years. He operates a forklift in the yard where 12 employees are employed. An officer of the union, he was one of the union negotiators of the last collective-bargaining agreement, negotiated in 1975. He testified against the Respondent in the prior NLRB proceeding.

Whiteside testified in this case that on February 4 or 5, 1980, Richardson told him, in another employee's presence, "that if I got out of the Union, he would make me a boss of the Ralph Low[e] Yard . . . a new yard just acquired by the Company"; that Whiteside responded he would take the job "if the Union would come along with me"; but that Richardson told him, "I had to get out of the union, period, in order to get the job." Whiteside also testified that on August 4, 1980, he asked Yard Foreman Rimmer why he had never been promoted to general operator (one of the highest paid nonsupervisory classifications in the plant) and that Rimmer told him, on this and several other occasions before and afterwards, "that I couldn't make general operator because I was in the union," and that Rimmer had been assigned as foreman of the yard "to get rid of all the niggers and old union men [and] if he got rid of the niggers, he'd get rid of the union."

As the General Counsel points out, this testimony is unrebutted inasmuch as neither Richardson nor Rimmer was called to the witness stand, Richardson because he was hired by a Saudi Arabian company not affiliated with the Respondent and left this country in February 1981, and Rimmer because he has been discharged and, as the Respondent's counsel stated, is "no longer under [the Respondent's] control." The General Counsel's reliance doubtless is on the "missing witness rule" which the Board has defined as follows:[5]

> . . . where relevant evidence which would properly be part of a case is within the control of the party whose interest it would naturally [serve] to produce it, and he fails to do so, without satisfactory explanation, the [the trier of fact] may draw an adverse inference that such evidence would have been unfavorable to him.

Here, the Respondent's explanation for its failure to produce Richardson and Rimmer seemed less than satisfactory, especially as to Rimmer.[6] But while it is perhaps the usual, it is not the invariable, practice to credit the General Counsel's witnesses in such a situation,[7] and other factors prevent me from crediting Whiteside.

Whiteside was prone to exaggeration; he was inconsistent at times; and his demeanor did not create enough confidence in his reliability to justify accepting his word without dependable corroboration. Thus, Richardson may have actually intended only to indicate that the Respondent's foremen were not allowed to be union members, rather than to promise him a reward for abandoning the Union. The only other testimony as to any such remark by Richardson was given by Joe Ross whom I find below to be an undependable witness. Further, it seems unlikely that Richardson would hold out the foreman's position described by Whiteside in view of Vice President Lubke's testimony, which I credit, that the Respondent acquired the Ralph Lowe Company on December 28, 1979; that Richardson had no authority over the newly acquired operation; and that there were no openings in the yard of the new operation, contrary to Whiteside's testimony that the Respondent hired a man off the street to fill the yard foreman's job there.

The remark Whiteside attributed to Rimmer about getting rid of the Union by "firing the niggers and the old union men" is corroborated only by testimony by Ross, and by testimony given by Darrell Taylor of similar remarks "continuously" made by Richardson, whom he alleged also referred specifically to Whiteside as a "prime problem causer for the union" he was going to fire. However, Taylor's credibility was undermined by his admission that he has served a prison term for felony, by his obvious exaggerations, and by the bias against the Respondent he revealed in a letter written after he quit the Respondent's employ.

Other factors which mitigate against Whiteside are the dubiousness of his qualifications for the job of general operator featured in his testimony, and his acknowledgement that other blacks and union supporters prospered at the Respondent's plant before the charge was filed in this case, such as Roy Brown, another member of the 1975 negotiating team, promoted in October 1979 and February 1980; Harrison Stewart, a black man who also testified against the Respondent in the prior unfair labor practice proceeding, promoted to general operator in April 1980; and Adam Hignojos, a union committeeman in 1978, promoted to general operator in the custom shop in 1978 and foreman of the custom shop in April 1980.

[6] The fact that Rimmer was discharged does not establish, by itself, that he is no longer within the Respondent's control as meant by the rule. Thus, the Respondent does not assert that it does not know Rimmer's whereabouts or that it tried unsuccessfully to serve a subpena on him. As to Richardson, the Respondent appears to know his whereabouts but did not, as far as the record shows, apply for permission to take a deposition from him under Sec. 102.30 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended. On the other hand, I note that Richardson did not leave this country until February 1981, 6 months after the charge was served on the Respondent and 5 months after the complaint was issued. In these circumstances it is not clear that I would be justified in presuming that Richardson would not have been available and would not have been called as a witness had the hearing been scheduled during the 5-month period between the time the complaint was issued and the time he left the country.

Accordingly, I find that these allegations are not supported by credible evidence, and I conclude that they must be dismissed.

C. Alleged Violation of Section 8(a)(5)

The complaint alleges, and the answer denies, that in July 1980 the Respondent refused to bargain with the Union by unilaterally discontinuing its prior practice of issuing work gloves to employees in the yard department.

The complaint alleges and the Board made a finding in its Decision and Order at 248 NLRB 491, which is binding on me, that the Union is the exclusive bargaining representative of an appropriate unit of all production and maintenance employees at this plant.

It has long been the Respondent's practice to issue rubber-like chemical-covered fabric gloves costing about $5 a pair to its employees, including its yard employees who received a pair a week. In late July 1980, Wayne Hale, who had become plant manager the preceding April, noticed gloves strewn about the premises including the yard, and issued instructions to all supervisors to "attempt to control the use of gloves and stop the waste." Hale did not intend to stop the distribution of gloves entirely but one of his supervisors, Dan Rimmer, foreman of the yard, informed the yard employees that Hale had forbidden him to issue any gloves because they were too expensive. The Union was not notified of or bargained with about Rimmer's action.

In early August, Vice President Lubke informed Hale that a complaint had been made to the NLRB (the pertinent charge was served on the Respondent August 12). Hale thereupon investigated and, upon discovering that Rimmer had quit issuing gloves altogether, ordered Rimmer "to start issuing gloves, like we had been doing before."[8]

In my opinion, Rimmer's conduct did not amount to "a material, substantial [or] significant" unilateral change in working conditions.[9] On the contrary, it was a simple mistake with minimal effect on only a few employees for a brief period of time, rectified immediately upon being brought to the plant manager's attention.[10] I therefore conclude that this allegation should be dismissed.

D. Alleged Violation of Section 8(a)(3)

The complaint alleges that the Respondent discharged Joe Ross on January 21, 1980, because he joined or assisted the Union or engaged in union or protected concerted activities. The Respondent contends Ross was discharged for cause.

1. Facts

Joe Ross was employed at this plant for 17 years. Around 1972 Ross was assigned to the custom shop as a sandblaster.[11] He progressed to operator and in 1975 or 1976 was appointed general operator.[12] At the time of Ross' discharge on January 21, 1980, the custom shop complement consisted of Dan Chew who had been foreman since 1978; Adam Hignojos employed 3 years and a general operator for 2 years; Arthur Gonzales, an operator; and Richard French and one other employee (Joe) who were sandblasters. Dan Chew was a member of the Union until appointed to his first supervisory position in 1974. Adam Hignojos was a union committee member in 1978 and as such participated in the contract negotiations of October and November that year; he attended the hearing held in the prior NLRB proceeding in April and June 1979 relating to those negotiations, sitting with the General Counsel and union officials. Richard French was a member of the Union in September and October 1978. Joe Ross resigned his union membership in September 1969 and has never rejoined, nor has he attended any meetings of the Union.[13]

Ross was considered by management and employees to be an experienced, skilled, and knowledgeable employee. Ross received no discipline or reprimands until the events involved in this case. During the summer of 1979, Ross received an award for 15 years' service with the company, and was told at that time by Foreman Chew that he "did a good job," and by Executive Vice President Ward that "we appreciate your work."

[8] Based on Hale's credited testimony. I cannot credit Whiteside that no gloves were issued for a period of 3 months.

[9] See Peerless Food Products, Inc., 236 NLRB 161 (1978).

[10] Peerless Food Products, Inc., supra; Bureau of National Affairs, Inc., 235 NLRB 8 (1978). I find it unnecessary to rule on additional grounds advanced by the Respondent for dismissing this allegation.

[11] The function of the custom shop is to clean steel pipe used by the oil drilling industry and coat it with plastic to retard rust and corrosion. Whereas the tube shop deals only with straight pipe and pipe joints, the custom shop does more difficult work with fabrications, crooked joints, vessels, valves, and collars of various shapes and sizes. The pipe is blown out to remove sand and dirt and then burned to remove grease, oil, and parafin; it is then wheelabrated (thrown into a spinner and cleaned with steel grit), sandblasted with a hose, primed, and coated.

[13] I cannot credit any of Ross' testimony regarding coercive remarks Plant Manager Richardson allegedly made to him during 1978 and 1979, that he was going to get rid of the old hands, old folks, the niggers, Ross, Whiteside, and anybody that was with the Union; that Richardson offered Ross a bonus and a foreman's job if he would help get a petition started to get rid of the Union; nor Ross' testimony about starting to talk about being interested in joining the Union. This testimony was vague and inconsistent as to what Richardson allegedly said, when he said it, and how it affected Ross' relationship with Richardson; and it conflicted with other testimony by Ross that Richardson was praising his work and telling him "not to let those damn Mexicans get the best of me," apparently during the same period. Ross did not say he told Richardson or any other member of management he was interested in joining the Union nor was there any statement to that effect in his pretrial affidavit. Nor can I credit Darrell Taylor that once in August 1979, and approximately 25 times after that during Taylor's last 2 months of employment, he recommended that Richardson promote Ross to foreman and Richardson replied, "Hell, no, he's not going to promote that union-loving son of a bitch; he'd get rid of him." In addition to other considerations relevant to Taylor's unreliability set forth above, this testimony is also inconsistent with testimony by Ross heretofore recited.

Ross was disappointed that Chew was designated foreman of the custom shop instead of him and he was "hurt" that Hignojos was promoted to the same level of general operator occupied by Ross when Hignojos had so much less experience than Ross. Although Chew designated Ross the ranking general operator, because, he said, Ross was the senior employee in the shop and Chew looked up to and respected him, conflict nevertheless developed between Ross and Hignojos. Hignojos said the conflict was caused by Ross' favoring short cuts in the work and refusing to do his share. Richard French confirmed that Ross "slacked off" during his last 2-1/2 or 3 years and particularly during his last 6 months when "you wouldn't be able to find him, when you needed him." Chew agreed, reciting an occasion in August 1979 when the shop was engaged in a special assignment and Ross refused to work overtime and left without telling Chew.

In late August or early September 1979 while Chew was on vacation, the conflict between Ross and Hignojos came to a head when Hignojos refused Ross' order to load some pipe because he felt Ross should load them himself and shortly thereafter Hignojos needed Ross to help shoot (coat) couplings and found Ross in the plant bathroom shaving. Hignojos took the matter to Richardson who talked with the two of them separately. In his interview, Hignojos complained that Ross did not do his share and encouraged the employees to do slipshod work. Richardson told him to continue doing his own work the way it was supposed to be done and not to worry about Ross. Ross testified that Richardson was only "trying to create trouble between us" by telling each of them he was a boss. When Chew returned from vacation, Richardson informed him that Hignojos had complained about Ross' not doing his share of the work, and Chew responded that something should be done about the conflict between them. Richardson promised to think about it. A few weeks later Chew complained again about the problem and Richardson sent for Ross and offered him the job of coupling coordinator in the tube shop and Ross accepted it. Ross testified that Richardson told him at this interview, "I was creating problems up there at the Custom Shop."[14]

Things went smoothly in the custom shop while Ross was in the tube shop, but after about 2 weeks Richardson told Chew he had to transfer Ross back because "he got to visiting the working hands down there [in the tube shop] too much and the supervisors were throwing a fit about it." Ross testified Richardson told him he was creating problems in the tube shop, but Ross denied it on the grounds that he could not even communicate with the employees in the tube shop, much less create problems, because he could not speak Spanish with them and they could not speak English with him.[15] Upon Ross' return, Chew posted a notice dated October 26, 1979, describing Ross' and Hignojos' duties in another attempt to resolve the conflict between them. The notice put Ross in charge of equipment maintenance and Hignojos in charge of coating operations.[16]

In December 1979 a large quantity of 10-inch pipe and pup joints which the Company had coated for Gulf Oil Company was returned to be checked for improper coating and for recoating if necessary. Chew assigned the testing, or sparking, job to Ross. On December 30, Ross borrowed a lift from the yard, carried the pipe to the airhose, and blew the sand and grit out of it. On December 31, Ross did the sparking and reported that some of the pipe had holidays (flaws in the coating) but the pups were holiday free. Chew and Richardson, in Ross' presence, checked Ross' work and found some of the pipe Ross had marked good had holidays and some of the pup joints were not holiday free. Chew wrote this incident up in a memo to Richardson on January 7, 1980. When Chew discussed the incident with Ross, Ross denied telling Chew that the pups were holiday free, so Chew wrote another memo to Richardson, with copies to Vice President Lubke and Area Manager Anderson, on January 8, affirming his January 7 report despite Ross' denial. Chew added that some of the pipe that Ross had marked bad had no holidays and some he had marked good were bad when he and Richardson resparked them. Chew's memo continued:

> He is irresponsible. This man interferes with production and the morale of the employees. He was transferred to the tube shop because he could not work with the employees at the custom shop. Within two weeks he had cuased [sic] the same friction in Tube Shop. He was put back in the custom shop. He has been a problem for a long time. I am requesting his transfer or termination.[17]

On January 15, Ross was summoned to Richardson's office where, in the presence of Chew and Area Manager William Anderson, Richardson confronted Ross with his poor performance, and asked if there was a reason for it as they were all there to help him. Ross replied he thought the pups were good and did not know why they were bad, that he might have forgotten to look at the other end of them and that his eyesight was not all that good. Anderson directed Richardson to check the equipment and the lighting to make sure they were in working order though other employees were having no problems with them.[18]

[14] At another point, Ross testified that neither Richardson or Chew discussed his transfer to the tube shop with him.

[15] Ross testified at another point that he was transferred back to the custom shop because he turned out so many collars in the tube shop that the custom shop could not keep up. I find that this was not the reason for Ross' return to the custom shop.

[16] I cannot believe Ross' testimony that Richardson told him at that time he put him in charge of maintenance because it would give him a wage increase and Ross would "be above the other guy." Ross did not receive an increase.

[17] The facts with regard to this incident are based on the credited testimony of Chew supported by documentary evidence. I consider Chew, who is no longer employed by the Respondent and whose demeanor was very impressive, generally the most credible of the witnesses. Ross' account was too inconsistent and improbable to be believed. Thus, he said he reported some of the pup joints bad and some holiday free; that he also agreed with Chew that he reported all the pup joints holiday free and denied he ever told Chew he had not done so. Ross also testified that the pipe which sparked did so because it was full of sand and debris which he wanted to blow out but was refused a lift to carry it to the airhose; and that it did not spark when Chew and Richardson tested it because, although still full of sand and grit, they "had the ground off" so the test could not produce sparks. At another point, Ross indicated that the pipe he reported he had did not spark when Chew and Richardson tested it because they blew the sand and grit out of it before they sparked it, which they had not allowed him to do.

Meanwhile, Chew set up a second shift because of an overload of work in the custom shop and assigned Ross and Richard French to it. On January 16, the day after Ross' meeting with management, Chew directed them to coat some pups which Hignojos had sandblasted and primed, coat some couplings, and sandblast and prime some fabricated pieces for coating by the day shift. The day shift discovered, however, that all the pups had not been coated and those which were had to be reworked because the coating was blistered and had holidays in it, and a fab piece had been primed with sand in it and had to be burned out, reblasted, and reprimed before it could be recoated. Chew reported this to Richardson in a memo dated January 17, adding that he asked Ross if he forgot to blow the sand out of the pipe and Ross told him he did blow it out and did not know how the sand got in it. Chew ended his memo with a recommendation, "You need to have a talk with him."[19]

On January 17, Ross and French again failed to complete the work assigned to the night shift, and again did an unacceptable job coating the pups. In his memo to Richardson dated January 18, Chew recommended that Ross "needs to be talked to about his job."[20]

On January 18, Richard French told Foreman Chew that he did not want to work the second shift with Ross any longer because Ross did not do his share of the work, and Chew told them both to return to the day shift the next day.[21] Meanwhile, Chew left instructions for French to coat some couplings with 519 that night and for Ross to coat some other couplings which were a rush job. During the shift Ross telephoned Chew at home that he could not do the job assigned to him and that Chew should direct French to do it. Chew said no, French must do the job assigned to him as both jobs had to be completed by the end of the shift. Sixteen of the couplings coated by Ross had to be burned out and recoated.[22] Chew reported these events in a January 19 memo to Richardson, which he ended with, "Joe has a bad attitude which is hurting the attitude of the employees in the Custom Shop and their production."

On January 22, Chew was called into Vice President Lubke's office and, in the presence of Lubke, Chew, and Anderson, Richardson discharged him.[23] The discharge slip made out on Ross and signed by Vice President Lubke states:

> After several warnings by supervisor and managers of the Odessa Plant, this action had to be taken because of the following reasons: unable to work with his co-workers and supervisors, poor production, poor-quality, bad attitude and work habits.[24]

2. Conclusions

To establish the alleged discriminatory nature of Ross' discharge, the General Counsel relies on the union animus of the Respondent and of Plant Manager Richardson as revealed in the prior unfair labor practice proceeding; Ross' recognized status as the most experienced, skilled, and knowledgeable employee in the custom shop; the alleged abruptness of his discharge after 17 years' employment; and the absence of progressive discipline.

It might seem that the Respondent's management was inept in dealing with the failings of an old and theretofore valued employee. However, it was established by credible, corroborative testimony that Ross' performance began to deteriorate sometime after he missed out on the customshop foreman's job and Hignojos was promoted to his level, both of which incidents he admittedly resented. It was doubtless this resentment which was behind Ross' conflicts with Hignojos and his tendency during his last months of employment to do less than his share of the work. By the fall of 1979, Ross' conduct interfered with the work of the custom shop so much that Richardson and Chew felt required to transfer him to the tube shop and, then, when that failed even though he had been informed of the problems he was causing, to assign him and Hignojos to separate areas of responsibility in the custom shop. None of these steps had the desired effect, however, and then in late December 1979 Ross turned in such a poor performance on an important job that Chew recommended his transfer or termination, but instead he was counseled both by Foreman Chew individually and by Chew, Richardson, and Anderson together on January 15, 1980. Nonetheless, Ross turned in poor performances the rest of the week. It is clear, therefore, that Ross' discharge was not abrupt, but was based on his deteriorating performance over a considerable period of time, culminating in his disregard of management's efforts to turn him around at the beginning of his last week. Although no progressive discipline was handed out in the form of written warnings or suspension, it was not shown that it was the Respondent's practice to follow such a disciplinary procedure at this plant. In any event, as Ross was told that his transfers were made because of the problems he caused in both shops, and as he was counseled by his foreman and by management as a group, it cannot be said that he was not forewarned that his conduct had become unacceptable.

[18] This account of the interview represents my best estimate of what most likely took place based chiefly on the testimony of Chew, supplemented by that of Anderson. Ross' testimony to the effect that, after he gave his version as set forth in the footnote above, he told the supervisors, "that I would like to know if I could get in the union . . . As long as [Richardson] was with P. A. that I wanted to be a union member . . . That I would love to be in it and be treated like everybody else," was credibly denied by Chew and Anderson and was inherently improbable. When asked to expain what he meant by wanting to be in the Union so he would be treated like everybody else, Ross said he was hurt because Hignojos was in the same classification as he even though Hignojos had less seniority; but he then said that was not the reason, as the reason was that Richardson was creating trouble between himself and Hignojos "so he could get a reason to kick me out."

[19] Based on Chew's credited testimony. Although Ross remembered little about this incident, he claimed he was not familiar with "519" coating which was designated for this job, as it had seldom been used by the Company. Chew credibly testified that 519 had been used in the custom shop since before he arrived there.

[20] Ross blamed his low production and his difficulties with the coating on the poor condition of these pipes and his unfamiliarity with 519.

[21] Based on the corroborative testimony of Chew and French. I do not credit Ross, who was not corroborated, that Chew told him they were being returned to the day shift because Chew said French was drinking on the job, although Ross protested that he himself did not say French was drinking.

[22] Based on Chew's credited testimony. Ross testified he was the one assigned to coat with 519, and in his telephone conversation with Chew he told Chew about his difficulties applying the 519 and he wanted French to help him, but Chew refused and told him to have the couplings coated with 519 by the end of the shift even if he had to paint it on with a brush. Ross was not suprised, he said, when many of the couplings were found to be defective. Chew credibly testified that in any event 519 is applied as a spray and he denied ever telling Ross to put it on with a brush.

[23] Based on Anderson's and Lubke's credited accounts, corroborated in the main by Chew. Ross testified that, when Richardson informed him he was discharged, he told Richardson he "didn't want to hear nothing about it" and Richardson gave him no reason for the discharge; that he thought he was being fired for "straightening up some of [Richardson's] messes there in LaMesa and Seminole," or for abuse of the Company's credit card for buying gasoline because, he said, "the gas was pouring out of my car," but then he said, "I was using [the] gasoline to clean the coating, so I could recoat his mess." On cross-examination, Ross testified that at the discharge interview he asked for his bonus, a reference to Richardson's alleged promise of a bonus if he would help get the Union out; although he had not signed the decertification petition or otherwise helped to get the Union out, he said, "I wanted them to know that I knew about it." Ross further testified, on cross-examination, that about the time he walked out of the interview, he told the management representatives, "Well, let's just wait a minute about my firing. I want to ask you about me joining the union. Before you fire me, I want you to know, I would love to be in the union." Ross' pretrial affidavit contains no reference to Ross' asking for a bonus or saying he wanted to join the Union and the three management witnesses credibly denied that he did.

[24] I accept as reasonable Foreman Chew's testimony that French was not disciplined for the unsatisfactory performance of the night shift because he did not bear the responsibility borne by Ross as a general operator.

With regard to the alleged antiunion motivation, the record shows that Ross had not been a member of the Union during the last 10 years of his employment, since long before the Respondent's unfair labor practices of 1978. Although the Respondent revealed hostility toward the Union at that time, it had no reason, except for the absence of Ross' signature on the decertification petition, to believe that he was one of the Union's advocates or supporters. Nothing that happened subsequently would reasonably lead management to suspect anything different. Ross' attempt to establish an expression of intent to cast his lot with the Union at his counseling session of January 15 was totally incredible. But even if he had expressed such an intent, it is impossible to believe that management would have fired him for it, when there were other employees known to be union leaders, officials, and advocates who were tolerated and even advanced. Moreover, Foreman Chew, who initially recommended termination and was responsible for the reports of unsatisfactory performance which eventually resulted in termination, had himself been a union member; and two of the employees who complained about the difficulties of working with Ross were Richard French who had also been a union member and Adam Hignojos who was a prominent and well-known union leader.

Accordingly, in all the circumstances, including the absence of credible evidence of current hostility toward the Union, the absence of credible evidence that Ross was an advocate or supporter of the Union or that the Respondent had reasonable grounds for suspecting that he was, Ross' job performance deterioration over a period of several months during which he was cautioned and counseled culminating in a week of less than satisfactory performance, all of which interfered with the efficiency of the Respondent's operations, and the absence of disparate treatment, I find that a preponderance of the credible evidence fails to establish that the reason advanced for Ross' discharge was a pretext or that his discharge was to any extent motivated by discriminatory considerations. I conclude that this allegation should be dismissed.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[25]

The complaint is dismissed entirely.

[25] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Ahrens Aircraft, Inc. and Asociacion Internacional de Maquinistas y Trabajadores Aerospaciales, AFL-CIO. Case 24-CA-4322

December 29, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On February 19, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Arline Pacht issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief[1] and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt her recommended Order,[4] as modified herein.

The Administrative Law Judge found, in the remedy section of her Decision, that Respondent should be ordered to offer discriminatees Mercado and Rivera reinstatement to the jobs of which they were unlawfully deprived or, if such jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs, when Respondent resumes operations, and that Respondent should be ordered to make them whole for any losses they may have suffered from the date of their discharges, May 21, 1980, to such date as Respondent demonstrates during the compliance stage of this proceeding that they might have been laid off in the normal course of business.[5] She further specified, in her recommended Order, that Respondent be required to offer Mercado and Rivera reinstatement as soon as Respondent resumes its aircraft assembly operations or has appropriate jobs, whichever comes first. The recommended remedy and Order would thus appear to assume that Mercado and Rivera would have been laid off at some point prior to the hearing date. We note, however, that at the beginning of the hearing counsel for Respondent stated in arguing in support of a motion to dismiss that the issues are moot because Respondent had been forced to lay off over 80 percent of its employee work force, and that the plant had been temporarily shut down since late May 1980. Counsel stated at that time that there were "some 35 or 36 employees, which is just really a skeleton crew, at the plant to keep the plant somewhat functional for their tax exemption purposes and to receive mail." Because it is not clear whether or not Mercado and Rivera would have been retained by Respondent as part of this skeleton crew but for Respondent's discrimination against them, we shall clarify the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order by deleting its reference to offering Mercado and Rivera reinstatement when Respondent resumes operations or has appropriate jobs, so as not to preclude a finding at the compliance stage of this proceeding that they would not have been laid off absent the discrimination practiced against them. We shall also order expunction of any reference in Respondent's files to Mercado's and Rivera's discharges.

[1] Respondent's motion that the Board remand this case for rehearing so that Respondent may present the testimony of Peter Ahrens, president of Ahrens Aircraft, who was unavailable for the hearing because he was out of Puerto Rico and in Washington, D.C., on business, is hereby denied. Although Respondent contends that Peter Ahrens' testimony as to supervisory issues and the appropriateness of the bargaining unit is indispensable to its case, Respondent did present several witnesses who were intimately familiar with Respondent's operations and who testified relative to these matters. These witnesses included Respondent's vice president in charge of purchasing, production, and personnel, Edd Ahrens, as well as its production manager, Carlos Ruiz. Further, when afforded an opportunity by the Administrative Law Judge to make an offer of proof with regard to any testimony which counsel for Respondent might wish to elicit from witnesses who could not be present, Respondent declined to do so. In any event, the matters which Respondent urges would be established through the testimony of Peter Ahrens—specifically, on the supervisory issue, that a high ratio of supervisors is required in the aviation industry, and, on the unit issue, that the production of aircraft mandates a wide variety of diverse skills, training, and personnel—would not alter our conclusions herein.

[2] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing her findings.

[3] The Administrative Law Judge's Decision contains several apparently inadvertent errors which do not, however, affect the results herein. First, the Administrative Law Judge lists in fn. 5 of her Decision the individuals Respondent contends are supervisors, stating that there are 20 such persons whose status is in dispute. Only 19 names are listed therein, the 20th individual alleged by Respondent to be a supervisor, Juan Martir, having been agreed by both Respondent and the General Counsel to be a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. References in other portions of the Decision adverting to the 20 individuals whose status is in dispute are likewise in error. Second, the Administrative Law Judge refers in fn. 9 to Jt. Exh. 1(b) when it is apparent from the record that she in fact means Jt. Exh. 2. Finally, in the third paragraph of that section of the Decision entitled "Events in January 1980," the statement that several employees visited the ADT offices to complain that they had not received the contractually promised wage increase of $3.50 an hour should in fact state the contractually promised wage increase to $3.50 an hour.

[4] Member Fanning would make the bargaining order prospective in nature. See his separate opinion in Beasley Energy, Inc., d/b/a Peaker Run Coal Company, Ohio Division #1, 228 NLRB 93 (1977).

Member Jenkins would provide interest on the backpay award in accordance with his partial dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980).

[5] The Administrative Law Judge apparently inadvertently failed to cite Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), for the rationale on interest payments.

WE WILL NOT discharge, terminate, lay off, or refuse or fail to reinstate, recall, or rehire employees for engaging in union activity or for exercising any right under the Act.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees with discharge, plant closure, or any other reprisals for engaging in union or other protected concerted activity.

WE WILL NOT create the impression that we are keeping employees' union activities under surveillance.

WE WILL NOT instruct employees they are ineligible to join a union.

WE WILL NOT question employees concerning their interest in or sympathies for the Union.

WE WILL offer Eduardo Mercado and Frederick Rivera immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs, and WE WILL make each of them whole, with interest, for all moneys lost as a result of their dismissal from work on May 21, 1980.

WE WILL expunge from our files any references to the discharges of Eduardo Mercado and Frederick Rivera on May 21, 1980, and WE WILL notify them both that this has been done and that evidence of these unlawful actions will not be used as a basis for future discipline against them.

WE WILL immediately recognize and, upon request, bargain with Asociacion Internacional de Maquinistas y Trabajadores Aerospaciales, AFL-CIO, as the exclusive representative of all the employees in the unit described below with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, WE WILL put such understanding into a written contract which we will sign. The appropriate unit is:

AHRENS AIRCRAFT, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ARLINE PACHT, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard in Mayaguez, Puerto Rico, on October 14–16, 1980, pursuant to a charge filed on May 23, 1980, by Asociacion Internacional de Maguinistas y Trabajadores Aeroespaciales, AFL-CIO, and a complaint which issued on August 8, and was amended on August 18, 1980. A timely answer was filed on August 20, 1980. The questions presented are whether (a) Respondent, Ahrens Aircraft, Inc., violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, by (1) threatening its employees with plant closure if they supported a union or engaged in concerted activities, (2) maintaining and enforcing an overly broad no-distribution rule, (3) threatening employees with discharge if they joined the Union, (4) improperly interrogating them about their concerted activities, and (5) creating the impression of surveillance; (b) violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by discharging Freddy Rivera and Eduardo Mercado; (c) Rivera and Mercado and 18 other employees were supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, (d) whether the unit defined in the complaint is appropriate, and (e) in the circumstances of this case, a bargaining order is appropriate.

Upon the record, including the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by counsel for the General Counsel and for Respondent, I hereby make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a Delaware corporation, maintains an office and place of business (hereafter called the plant) in Aguadilla, Puerto Rico, where it is engaged in the design, manufacture, and sale of a prototype aircraft. During the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint, a representative period, Respondent purchased and received at its plant goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which were transported directly from points outside Puerto Rico.

I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The Union is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.[1]

II. SUPERVISORY ISSUES

A. The Evidence

1. Plant structure

The parties stipulated that as of May 23, 1980, 118 employees comprised the Ahrens Aircraft work force, and that, of this number, 113 signed authorization cards, including 20 persons who Respondent contends and the General Counsel denies were supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

Respondent's organizational structure was multitiered, with members of the Ahrens family occupying the most senior positions. Peter Ahrens serves as the Company's president; his wife Magda Juame is comptroller; one son, Edd Ahrens, is vice president in charge of production, purchasing, and personnel; a second son, Kim Ahrens, is vice president of engineering. At the next lower rung of responsibility, with daily and immediate oversight over employees in three operating divisions, as of May 1980, was Carlos Ruiz who reported to Edd Ahrens. Jose Morales, project engineer, who reported to Kim Ahrens, occupied a similar position of authority with respect to the two other divisions. Each major division was headed by a senior supervisor. Three of these divisions, those under John Rodriguez, Anthony Acosta,[2] and Carlos Rivera, were divided into some five or six shops.[3] Each such shop was under the direction of a "junior supervisor," as Respondent referred to them, and several of the shops were subdivided into sections.[4] It is the status of the employees heading each of the shops and shop sections which is in dispute here.[5]

[1] Respondent neither admitted nor denied that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act. Accordingly, pursuant to F.R.C.P. 8(b) and (d), the allegation will be deemed admitted.

[2] In April 1980, Rodriguez and Acosta became assistant plant managers to Ruiz. However, the record does not suggest that their duties changed with respect to the management of the shops within their divisions. At the same time that Rodriguez and Acosta received new titles, they and other division chiefs became salaried employees.

[3] The other two major divisions, drafting and quality control, had only eight employees each and, therefore, functioned as single units.

[4] The wing shop, under the direction of Senior Supervisor Robert McQue, had two sections: Wing I which was headed by Freddy Rivera and wing II by George Montalvo. Similarly, the fuselage shop was directed by Jose Christy with two sections led by Hiram Enchautegui and Juan Mendez.

[5] The 20 men who Respondent contends were supervisors, the shop to which each was assigned, and the number of employees working with them are as follows: Ariel Berrios—horizontal tail (2); Jose Christy—fuselage; Hiram Enchautegui—fuselage I (5); Juan Mendez—fuselage II (5); Adalberto Cuadrado— (2); Manuel Lopez—fluid systems (none); Melvin Martinez—engine instruments (2); Eduardo Mercado—experimental (1); Abraham Mora—sponson (2); Nicholas Ramirez—flight deck (2); George Montalvo—wing II (3); Freddy Rivera—wing I (5); Luis Rivera—control surfaces (8); Wilfredo Ramos—parts shop I (9); Neftali Rodriguez—parts shop II (7); Julio Lopez—parts shop III (7); Juan Salas—tailgate doors (5); Alfredo Sosa—drafting (7); Jose Valentin—hydraulics (6).

2. Responsibilities of junior supervisors

The record establishes that the authority to hire, fire, suspend, or impose other discipline on employees was vested in Edd Ahrens. He, with Ruiz, assigned employees to particular shops based on the work to be done, and determined when to transfer particular employees from one group to another. They also mapped out work assignments for each shop. Ruiz then transmitted the assignments to the shop supervisors on a daily basis. Thereafter, the junior supervisor distributed those assignments to each member of his crew taking into account the experience of the various employees. A record of jobs performed was maintained by each worker. At the end of the week, the shop and section leaders initialed the forms and submitted them to Ruiz.

Although the shop supervisors were responsible for instructing, guiding, and correcting their coworkers, they spent the greater portion of the day performing their own manual assignments side by side with their coworkers. Shop and section supervisors were paid at an hourly rate ranging from 50 cents to $1 to $2 more per hour than other members of the shop. They punched a timeclock and worked the same number of hours as other production employees. They had no responsibility for assigning or approving overtime; rather, at Ruiz' request, they themselves worked overtime at the standard double pay. Requests for excused absences also had to be approved by Ruiz. Although Edd Ahrens testified that the junior supervisors were empowered to reprimand other employees orally or in writing, there was no evidence that such power, if it existed, ever was exercised.[6] Ahrens also testified that the shop supervisors were authorized to recommend employee transfers. However, Abraham Mora, an alleged supervisor, testified that, when he requested two specific employees to be assigned to his shop, Ruiz assigned two others.

On a semiannual basis, the junior supervisors evaluated the employees in their groups using forms provided by the Company. Each form listed a number of areas such as attendance or cooperation for which the evaluator was to assign a number from 1 (unacceptable) to 5 (excellent). The evaluations then were submitted to Ruiz who reviewed them and added his own narrative comments as to the employee's abilities. Ruiz submitted the evaluations to Edd Ahrens who determined whether and how much of a pay raise within a 4- to 6-percent range the employee should receive.

At irregular intervals, generally every 1 or 2 months, junior and senior supervisors attended staff meetings called and conducted by Ruiz. The principal topics of discussion related to the production of the aircraft, but occasionally other matters such as attendance, tardiness, or observance of safety standards were raised.

3. Work histories of Mercado and Rivera

An examination of the work histories of Eduardo Mercado and Freddy Rivera provides added insight into the role and status of the junior supervisor in Respondent's plant.

Mercado (with 10 years) and Rivera (with 7 years' prior experience in aircraft assembly) were first employed by Respondent in 1978 and sent to the Northrop Institute of Technology for technical training. Shortly after returning to the Ahrens plant, Mercado was assigned to the tail cone boom section with four employees under his charge and then to the fuselage shop. In October 1979, he was transferred to the experimental shop where, as the sole employee, he reported directly to Ruiz and Kim Ahrens. After 4 months, he requested assistance with the manual installation of the heavy landing gear doors on which he was working. Three employees were selected by Ruiz to work with Mercado but, in the latter part of April or early May, Ruiz transferred two of the three assistants back to their original shops.

Rivera's entire career with Respondent was as a junior supervisor in the wing shop. Initially, when there was only one wing under construction, he served as Senior Supervisor Robert McQue's sole assistant. However, in April 1980, when the assembly of a second wing commenced, the shop was divided into two sections. Rivera remained a leader of wing I with five employees and George Montalvo took charge of wing II with three other employees. Rivera explained that Ruiz handed out work assignments to McQue who, in turn, relayed them to Rivera and Montalvo for distribution to their crews. Rivera estimated that 70 to 75 percent of his workday was spent performing his own assignments in contrast to McQue who was engaged in manual tasks about 30 percent of the time. The balance of McQue's workday, according to Rivera, was devoted to planning and coordinating work, reviewing or preparing written requests for changes in the blueprint designs for various parts of the aircraft, or checking on supplies.

Both Mercado and Rivera testified that they evaluated the employees in their shops in March 1980. However, Ruiz disregarded Rivera's evaluations believing he was not sufficiently objective in assessing his coworkers' abilities. Instead, McQue prepared the evaluations of the employees in the entire wing shop including one for Rivera. Mercado's evaluations apparently were afforded no greater weight than Rivera's for only one of the three evaluation forms completed by him turned up in Respondent's files.

In contrast to Edd Ahrens' assertions, neither Mercado nor Rivera believed they had any authority to reprimand or discipline other employees. Indeed, Mercado related that on one occasion, when he attempted to correct the work methods of a man in his shop, the employee ignored Mercado and obtained a transfer to another shop from Ruiz.

B. Conclusions

The burden of proving the supervisory status of employees rests on Respondent as the party asserting that status. Tucson Gas & Electric Company, 241 NLRB 181 (1979). After carefully reviewing the relevant evidence and considering the principal factors on which Respondent relies in support of its position that the shop supervisors are supervisors under the Act, I find that burden has not been met.

[6] The only documentation of reprimands adduced by Respondent were several memos which Ruiz wrote concerning Mercado.

Respondent points out that the shop supervisors were responsible for assigning work to members of their respective groups. However, it is undisputed that the assignments which were planned by Edd Ahrens and Ruiz issued initially from Ruiz and were merely redistributed by junior supervisors to their fellow workers according to their level of experience. Thus, the degree of judgment exercised by the shop leaders in allocating jobs was very much limited by the direct involvement of their superiors. Put in proper perspective, the shop supervisor served as a conduit for management's instructions. The assignment of work was, therefore, routine in nature and did not depend on the exercise of independent discretion, which is a hallmark of the supervisor. See B-P Custom Building Products, Inc., 241 NLRB 1118 (1980); Cablevision Systems Development Co., a partnership, 251 NLRB 1319 (1980); Wirtz Manufacturing Company, Inc., 215 NLRB 252, 254 (1974).

Respondent further asserts that the shop supervisors exercised independent responsibility in directing the work of the shop employees. As the most experienced employees in each group, the shop leaders did train and guide their fellow workers in the performance of their jobs. However, they did not display any greater degree of authority than any senior, knowledgeable employee would in relation to less experienced juniors. See High Performance Tube, Inc., 251 NLRB 554 (1980); Hitchiner Manufacturing Company, 243 NLRB 927 (1979); Dependable Lists, Inc., 239 NLRB 1304, 1308 (1979); Tom's Ford, Incorporated, 233 NLRB 28 (1977). With two and even three senior supervisors above them who were engaged in direct daily review of the work in each shop, group leaders had little opportunity to exercise genuinely independent judgment. Although the shop leaders had the authority to correct the work of their fellow employees, there is no evidence that they could reprimand or otherwise discipline employees to an extent which might significantly affect the employee's job status or work to his detriment. Thus, the group leader exercised little meaningful control over his coworkers' performances. Tucson Gas & Electric Company, supra.

Respondent also suggests that because the shop supervisors performed evaluations of their fellow employees they were in a position to make effective recommendations leading to the reward of such employees. However, each evaluation was subject to Ruiz' scrutiny and he was at liberty to agree or disagree with the evaluator. In more than a dozen instances, Ruiz reduced the numerical score given by the shop supervisor and on most of the forms entered narrative comments which revealed a personal knowledge of that employee's work habits. What weight, if any, would be given to the initial evaluation was completely within Edd Ahrens' discretion. Since the evaluations were twice removed from the eventual bestowal of any benefit, and since the evaluation could be rejected by Respondent without explanation, as they were in Rivera's case, they cannot be regarded as having any decisive effect.[7] See Hydro Conduit Corporation, 254 NLRB 433 (1981).

Respondent submits that the attendance of shop supervisors at management meetings also indicates their supervisory status. Although under certain circumstances such attendance has identified an employee as a company representative, I am aware of no case in which such attendance, in the absence of other criteria, is sufficient to cloak an individual with supervisory status. It should also be noted that attendance at management meetings is not among the supervisory functions identified in Section 2(11).

Moreover, in no other area did the men who were alleged to be supervisors possess any characteristics of supervisory authority within the meaning of the Act. It is undisputed that they could not hire, fire, suspend, promote, transfer, reward, discipline, assign overtime, grant time off, or resolve the grievances of other employees. Nor does the evidence establish that they could effectively recommend such actions. Accordingly, I find that 19 of the 20 alleged supervisors were, in fact, nonsupervisory group leaders.[8]

The conclusions reached with respect to shop supervisors as a class apply with particular force to Freddy Rivera and Eduardo Mercado. Each was a seasoned employee, but expertise is not an exclusive property of a supervisor. Nor is it critical that they were called junior supervisors by management and group leaders by others; what is relevant is the actual authority they possessed, and not the conclusionary assertions of Respondent.

In this regard, it is significant that Rivera was at the lowest level in the chain of command, subordinate to McQue, Acosta, Ruiz, and Ahrens. Given the extent to which he was subjected to supervision, little room was left for Rivera to exercise independent judgment.

Mercado had only one employee working with him during the last month of his employment, and that was because it was physically difficult for him to perform the job alone. For a significant period of time he supervised no one. The Board frequently has suggested that a low ratio between the supervised and the supervisor, as was the case here, diminishes the degree of authority exercised by the person in charge.[9] See, e.g., Wirtz Manufacturing Co., supra at 253-254; Spector Freight System, Inc., 216 NLRB 551, 554 (1975).

Both men testified without controversion that they spent the greatest portion of their workday in manual labor, worked the same number of hours, punched a timeclock, received hourly pay, and received no pay when absent due to illness, in precisely the same manner as any other employee. That their hourly rate of pay was higher than those of many other employees merely reflects their greater experience and seniority with Respondent. Although they had some responsibility for instructing and correcting employees in their group, their guidance appeared to be offered in an informal and cooperative spirit for they were without power to put any bite into a command. It was apparent that Mercado and Rivera identified completely with the employees' interests. They did not regard themselves nor were they viewed by others as an arm of management, particularly when they were selected by their coworkers to represent them in forwarding their grievances to Respondent. See High Performance Tube, Inc., 251 NLRB 1362 (1980).

[7] Respondent also was unable to produce any evaluations from alleged Shop Supervisor Cuadrado.

[8] The record established that, like Robert McQue, Jose Christy had two assistants working under him. Further, he made several recommendations for promotion and evaluated persons alleged to be supervisors. However, the record was barren of any evidence that other functions Christy performed may have distinguished him from or aligned him with the other shop supervisors. Accordingly, I draw no conclusions as to Christy's nonemployee status. However, as discussed, infra, whether or not he is included in the unit does not affect the Union's majority status.

[9] Respondent included Alfred Sosa and Manuel Lopez among the group of 20 alleged supervisors. However, Jt. Exh. 1(b) shows that neither had any subordinate and, therefore, cannot be deemed supervisors under the Act. Respondent may not, by the mere imposition of a title, convert workers into supervisors.

III. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Events in January 1980

Respondent commenced its operations in Puerto Rico in 1976, attracted by the Commonwealth's offer of tax incentives and grants to underwrite training for both skilled and unskilled labor.

According to contracts executed between Respondent and the Administracion de Derecho al Trabajo (Workers Rights Administration, hereinafter referred to as ADT), 14-week sheet metal training programs were given at the Aguadilla plant to groups of unskilled employees who were referred to Respondent by ADT. Trainees were promised $2.90 during the training period, $3.26 upon its completion, and $3.50 an hour when the ADT contract expired in December 1979.

In January 1980, several of the ADT employees visited the ADT offices to complain that they had not received the contractually promised wage increase of $3.50 an hour.[10] An official there advised them that ADT had no way of compelling Respondent to abide by the terms of the then-expired contract. Subsequently, Edd Ahrens met with a delegation representing the discontented employees and informed them that the terms of the contract with ADT had been revised and that no raise would be forthcoming until after the next biannual evaluation was completed. During the course of the meeting, he mentioned that the Company was cooperating with Puerto Rico, and that the only reason it would leave was if a union were brought in. He also suggested that the Company could sell the blueprints for the aircraft to another company thereby leaving everyone without jobs.[11]

B. Events in May 1980

Early in May 1980, in response to the wishes of employees in the wing and quality control shops, Freddy Rivera drafted a petition requesting that management issue paychecks on a weekly rather than bimonthly basis. On the morning of May 12, Rivera gave the petition to George Montalvo who then circulated it among all the workers. By early afternoon, over 100 employees had signed the petition. It was turned over to Eduardo Mercado for presentation to management during a staff meeting scheduled later that day.

At the staff meeting that afternoon, after certain production problems were discussed, Ruiz invited questions from the participants. Mercado took the opportunity to mention the petition and asked Ruiz for his opinion as to whether the employees could be paid weekly. Ruiz reacted with some irritation, stating that he hoped the petition had not been signed on company time since this would be against company rules. The rule to which Ruiz was referring, as set forth in the employee handbook, made it an offense subject first to a warning and then to discharge to distribute "written or printed material to employees (irregardless [sic] of nature) without prior company approval or authorization."

Mercado assured Ruiz that the petition had been signed during the lunch period and on breaks. Then, Kim Ahrens, who also was present at the meeting, commented that it would be too costly for the Company to convert to a weekly pay system and suggested that the problem lay in the employees' failure to better budget their wages. Viewing these statements as a denial of the employees' request, Mercado felt it would be futile to present the written petition and, instead, returned it to another employee.

On Friday morning of the same week, the petition turned up on Ruiz' desk who then submitted it to Edd Ahrens. This prompted Ahrens to call another supervisory meeting at which time he upbraided those who had signed the petition. Ahrens took the position that the junior supervisors owed their loyalties to management and had erred in failing to dissuade the employees from signing petitions. He further contended that some of the signatures had been obtained by coercion and intimidation and that the circulation of the petition was in violation of company rules. After Ahrens left the meeting, a number of those present questioned their status as supervisors. Others made reference to a Puerto Rican law which required weekly pay as well as sick pay.[12] Freddy Rivera suggested that the minimum wage and National Labor Relations Board laws should be posted on the company bulletin board.

Following Respondent's apparent rejection of the petition, the employees gathered at a community gym after work on May 16, and elected a committee which was charged with preparing a list of grievances for presentation to management.[13]

The following day, a Saturday, the committee members met at Mercado's home and drafted a letter outlining a number of employee complaints.[14]

[10] The previous July, after completing the training program, several employees visited the ADT offices to inquire why they had not received the first wage increase provided in their ADT contracts. It is undisputed that, shortly thereafter, Edd Ahrens called these employees to his office and told them to direct their questions to him, not to ADT. A week later, the 16 affected employees received the requisite pay increases retroactive to the date on which their training concluded.

[11] My findings in this paragraph are based on a composite of the credited testimony of Peter Lugo and Ruben Ferrer whom I found, based on their demeanor, to be trustworthy witnesses. Their descriptions of the surprise they felt when Ahrens unexpectedly mentioned a union could not have been feigned and lends authenticity to their entire account of this meeting. Moreover, having given an uncontradicted account of the first meeting with Ahrens, it is far more likely that Ferrer's version of the second meeting, rather than Ahrens', also was accurate.

[12] The Company did not provide for paid sick leave.

[13] Those elected were Peter Lugo, Eduardo Mercado, Nicolas Ramirez, and Freddy Rivera.

[14] Generally, the complaints related to the matter of weekly pay, additional paid holidays, compensation for sick leave, the relationship be-

Continued

On Monday morning, May 19, Mercado hand-delivered the letter to Ruiz, telling him that the committee expected a response in 24 hours. During the course of the day, Johnny Rodriguez, an assistant plant manager, told Mercado that 24 hours was too short a time for management to respond. He also asked Rivera what would happen if the letter was not answered within 24 hours, to which Rivera replied that the employees would have to decide by majority vote, but that he doubted that a protest could be averted.[15] Later that day, Rodriguez told Mercado that the Company's response to the grievance letter was negative.

In reaction to the receipt of the grievance letter, Edd Ahrens and Ruiz embarked on a series of meetings with the employees in each shop throughout May 20 and 21. In describing the meeting which he attended with other employees in the wing shop, Rivera said that Ahrens discussed the various items in the grievance letter with the assembled group. When Mercado and 15 other employees met with Ahrens and Ruiz, Ahrens stated among other things that the Company might cease to exist if too much was asked of it.[16]

After work on May 20, Mercado arranged for another mass meeting of the employees at which time, Juan Maldanado, the Union's business representative, spoke about the procedures involved in organizing and described the rights which workers have.[17] Mercado then asked for a vote on whether the employees favored joining the Union. By a show of hands, a majority of those attending registered their approval. After the meeting ended, Mercado distributed authorization cards and obtained 37 signed cards immediately.

C. The Discharges

The following day, May 21, Mercado arrived at the plant parking lot at 6:30 a.m., one-half hour early, to distribute additional cards to employees before they entered the facility. He was joined shortly thereafter by employees Lugo, Rivera, and Enchautegui who also began to circulate union authorization cards and distribute union literature. As a large number of employees began to collect around them, they became aware that a number of Respondent's chief executives were watching the employees from the vantage point of a small platform outside the door which management used to enter the plant. Ruiz approached Mercado and warned him that he was violating company rules and could be fired for his activities. Mercado replied that he was acting lawfully as a union organizer. Rivera then handed Ruiz a copy of the union literature he had been distributing. Ruiz then warned him that he too could be fired for violating company rules by distributing union propaganda.

Later that morning, Ruiz told Mercado and Rivera they were fired as of noon that day for having violated the Company's rules. He further advised them that they would receive termination notices by mail. Ruiz prepared such notices and subsequently inserted them in each man's personnel file but never sent them to the men. Four of the six reasons cited for Mercado's dismissal had to do with his allegedly argumentative nature and inability to work well with others. In support of these conclusions, Ruiz alluded to several memos in Mercado's personnel folder documenting three arguments he had with employees in March, May, and June 1979. The last two reasons listed in Mercado's termination notice concerned his violating company rules by circulating the May 12 petition on company time and company premises.

In addition to his role in circulating the May 12 petition, three other reasons were outlined in the notice justifying Rivera's discharge, including an inability to work harmoniously with others and an unwillingness to encourage persons in his crew to engage in productive work. By this, Ruiz was referring to an incident in which an employee, Grace Peterson, allegedly accused Rivera of telling her to look busy when she needed a new assignment. In fact, Peterson testified that she told Ruiz it was Supervisor Robert McQue who made the statement which Ruiz attributed to Rivera. At the hearing, both Edd Ahrens and Ruiz testified that the decision to terminate Rivera and Mercado was made on either May 19 or 20 and was based on their belief that the two had originated the petition requesting weekly pay, thereby interfering with production.

D. Other Alleged Independent Violations

(a) On a day soon after employee Juan Mendez signed the first petition seeking weekly pay, he was told by Juan Martir that if he or anyone else became involved in union matters they could be fired.

(b) On May 21, in the parking lot prior to beginning work, Mendez handed a signed authorization card to a fellow employee under the scrutiny of the nearby company officials. Later that morning, Antonio Acosta approached Mendez at his work station and warned him that he or anyone else involved in issues such as strikes could be fired.[18]

(c) During the week of May 19, Martir called a special meeting of the quality control employees and advised them that they could not belong to the Union. Some of the employees reacted by laughing and several others suggested that Martir was incorrect. Martir responded by telling the employees he would check with William Black, a Federal Aviation Agency inspector working closely with Respondent.

(d) Later that day, Martir summoned the quality control employees to another meeting in Kim Ahrens' office. With Martir seated beside him, Inspector Black told the group that they should not join the Union for they were tween management and the workers, the inadequacy of medical services, and sanitary conditions at the plant.

[15] At one of the after-hours meetings of the employees, a vote was taken authorizing a strike. However, the exact date was not made known since there was some apprehension that reports of the workers' activities were being relayed to management.

[16] Respondent did not deny that Ahrens made this statement.

[17] Mercado contacted Maldanado the previous day because he was apprehensive that his prominent role in the employees' concerted activities might lead to management reprisals against him.

[18] For demeanor reasons, I credit Mendez' testimony in preference to Acosta's denial.

considered a part of management and that in his experience such employees were never represented by unions.

(e) Shortly after this meeting concluded, Martir told quality control employee Luis Muniz and Linda Santiago that they could be fired if they became involved with the Union.

(f) The day after these two meetings took place, Martir instructed employee Rey Mendez that quality control workers could not join the Union and would be discharged if they did so.

(g) Prior to the start of the workday on May 25, Peter Lugo was soliciting signatures on a union petition in the parking lot, when he was told he was being watched. At 7:30 a.m., he was summoned to Edd Ahrens' office where Ahrens questioned him about what he had been doing earlier that morning. When Lugo explained that he was soliciting signatures for the Union, Ahrens reprimanded him with a verbal warning for violating company rules. He also asked Lugo why the employees wanted to bring a union into the plant, and why they could not simply discuss their problems with Ruiz.

(h) On October 6, 1980, just 1 week before the instant hearing, Rey Mendez was called to an interview where, with Edd Ahrens present, one of Respondent's attorneys asked him whether Martir had held a meeting with the quality control staff, whether he had in fact threatened them about joining the Union, and whether FAA Inspector Black's remarks were perceived as threats by the employees.

IV. DISCUSSIONS AND CONCLUSIONS

A. Independent 8(a)(1) Violations

I find there is substantial and frequently uncontroverted evidence in the record which supports the General Counsel's allegations that Respondent engaged in an extensive series of unfair labor practices. Thus, in agreement with the General Counsel, I find that Respondent's comments in January 1980, to a delegation of employees who were pressing for higher wages, that the Company would abandon Puerto Rico if the plant was unionized and that it would sell its blueprints, leaving the employees jobless, were unequivocal threats of plant closure in violation of Section 8(a)(1). See DRW Corporation d/b/a Brothers Three Cabinets, 248 NLRB 828, 839 (1979); American Spring Wire Corporation, 237 NLRB 1551, 1553 (1978). This threat was conveyed months before the Ahrens employees actually began to organize. However, Edd Ahrens' similar remark to a group of employees on May 21, that the Company might close if too much pressure was placed on it by employees, came at the height of the Union's drive. An employer's allegation that employees' collective activity will lead to plant closure constitutes an unlawful threat rather than a lawful prediction unless the employer shows that its statement was based on objective facts which demonstrate probable consequences outside its control. N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc., 395 U.S. 575, 617-619 (1969). Here, Ahrens' comment was not an objective response to concrete costs attached to specific employee proposals. Rather, it was a threat clearly designed to discourage the employees from engaging in collective activity and is per se violative of Section 8(a)(1). Chester Valley, Inc., 251 NLRB 1435 (1980); Bacchus Wine Cooperative, Inc., and Bacchus Wine International, 251 NLRB 1552 (1980).[19]

I also find that Respondent's overly broad rule prohibiting the distribution of any printed material to employees without prior company authorization is illegal on its face.

Respondent attempted to prove that the rule was not unlawfully applied by showing that, at a staff meeting on May 12, Ruiz had limited the invocation of the rule only to the distribution of unauthorized materials on company time and company premises. However, Respondent was unsuccessful in disguising the untempered application of the rule to the distribution of union authorization cards and union literature by Rivera and Mercado on May 21. Although their circulation of union materials took place on the parking lot before working hours, Ruiz announced in the presence of a large number of employees that Rivera and Mercado could be fired for disobeying the Company's rule. Similarly, Respondent held Peter Lugo liable for violating the rule although his activities, too, occurred prior to the start of the workday. Accordingly, both in its promulgation of and adherence to the overly broad rule, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1). W. B. Johnson Properties, Inc., d/b/a Olympic Villas, 241 NLRB 358 (1979); Essex International, Inc., 211 NLRB 749 (1974).

Ruiz' threats to discharge Mercado and Rivera on May 21 were particularly pernicious since they were communicated in the presence of a large group of employees, and were made with the apparent endorsement of many of the Company's top management officials who were surveying the scene. Ruiz' testimony at the hearing in this case suggests that he knew the no-distribution rule should not have been applied to situations in which employees were circulating material during nonworking hours. Thus, his reliance on that rule to outlaw Mercado and Rivera's activities was merely a ruse to disguise a blatant effort to intimidate them and all the other employees present and to dissuade them from exercising their protected right to engage in collective activity.

Evidence that Juan Martir, manager of the quality control division, threatened employees with discharge and attempted to inhibit their union activity was abundant and uncontradicted. Respondent suggests, however, that Martir should be held blameless because of his honest conviction that quality control employees were not eligible for union membership. It is well settled that subjective motivation, even if innocent, is irrelevant to finding a respondent liable for the commission of unfair labor practices. That the employees laughed when Martir told them they could not join the Union is equally irrelevant for employees' subjective reactions to an alleged illegality may not be taken into account. (El Rancho Market, 235 NLRB 468, 471 (1978)). Thus, Martir's remarks to Rey Mendez, Juan Mendez, Luis Nunez, and Linda Santiago are blatant threats of reprisal against employees who may attempt to exercise their Section 7 rights. Moreover, in a plant the size of Respondent's where the work force is homogeneous, such statements were certain to receive widespread circulation. Martir's representations to all quality control employees that they could not join the Union are attributable to Respondent which acknowledged in its answer that he was a "part of the management team." As such, they constitute independent violations of Section 8(a)(1). Similarly, Respondent also is accountable for the remarks of third parties such as William Black when he in Martir's presence and with his apparent endorsement advised the employees they should not join the Union.

[19] Although Ahrens' statement was not alleged as an unfair labor practice in the complaint, it was part and parcel of Respondent's antiunion campaign and was a matter about which Respondent had ample opportunity to offer evidence. Accordingly, I find Respondent's threat to be another instance of unlawful conduct in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1). Justak Brothers and Company, Inc., 253 NLRB 1054 (1980); Ultra-Sonic De-Burring, Inc. of Texas, 233 NLRB 1060, 1068, fn. 12 (1977).

Based on my observations of the witnesses' demeanor, I further credit Juan Mendez' testimony that Supervisor Antonio Acosta warned him that employees who were involved with the Union would be fired, and I find this statement to be a threat also proscribed by Section 8(a)(1).

Peter Lugo's uncontradicted account of his May 25 interview with Edd Ahrens gives rise to additional findings of unlawful conduct. Less than an hour elapsed between the time that Lugo was engaged in union activities and the time he was paged to Ahrens' office thereby suggesting that his conduct was under observation. Creating the impression of surveillance is forbidden under the Act for it may tend to inhibit the employee's future union activities. Ravenswood Electronics Corp., 232 NLRB 609, 614–615 (1977). Under the guise of determining whether Lugo was engaged in sabotage or espionage, Respondent then proceeded to question him about his activities earlier that morning and about his reasons for wanting to bring a union into the plant. Although Lugo explained that he was collecting signatures for a union petition and although Ahrens knew that this had occurred prior to the start of the workday, he nevertheless issued a verbal warning. In these circumstances, the interrogation and the issuance of the warning were unlawful intrusions into Lugo's right to engage in union activity. That the interview had the inhibiting effect which Ahrens' intended is made clear from Lugo's assurance that he would refrain from such conduct in the future.

Respondent engaged in another episode of unlawful interrogation when it questioned employee Rey Mendez about the meetings which Martir and Black held with the quality control employees. By failing to assure Mendez that he was not compelled to participate in the interview and that he would suffer no reprisals, Respondent thereby ignored the standards for permissible interrogation required by Johnnie's Poultry Co. and John Bishop Poultry Co., Successor, 146 NLRB 770 (1964), enforcement denied 344 F.2d 617 (8th Cir. 1965).

B. Unlawful Discharges

Having found that Mercado and Rivera were employees entitled to the protections of the Act, a question still remains as to whether they were terminated on May 21 because of their involvement in concerted activities. A review of the circumstances surrounding these discharges leaves not a shred of doubt that they were fired for reasons which are violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3).

Respondent clearly had knowledge that Mercado and Rivera were profoundly involved in the employees' concerted activities and played an instrumental role in the Union's organizational campaign. Neither man took pains to conceal his activities. To the contrary, Rivera's signature headed the list of names on the first employee petition of May 12. Mercado forthrightly presented the employees' position concerning weekly pay at the May 12 supervisory meeting and just as forthrightly delivered the second petition to Ruiz on May 19. There was nothing covert about Mercado's role in organizing a meeting of employees after work at which the union business agent spoke, nor did Mercado or Rivera conceal their efforts to solicit union authorization cards on the company parking lot just before the start of the workday. Thus, Respondent had good reason to regard them as the staunchest advocates of the employees' collective interests and among the principal architects of the Union's organizational campaign. Given the timing of their discharges, only hours after they were observed distributing union materials by most of the Company's officials, an extremely compelling case is presented that Respondent terminated them for discriminatory reasons proscribed by the Act.

The rationalizations offered by Respondent in defense of its conduct are unconvincing. Respondent claims that the discharges were motivated by Mercado's and Rivera's misconduct in violating the Company's no-distribution rule. However, Edd Ahrens conceded at the hearing that he had no knowledge that Mercado and Rivera literally walked the petition from one employee to another on company time. Indeed, if they had wandered throughout the plant, they surely would have been observed by Ruiz or one of his assistants. Rather, Ahrens only harbored a belief that the two initiated the petition. The company rule does not prescribe penalties for those who merely originate petitions. Holding Mercado and Rivera accountable for this reason would, in itself, constitute an unfair labor practice. Moreover, if Respondent were concerned about the purported interruption of production, as it claimed, then all those who signed the petition were equally culpable. Yet, only Mercado and Rivera were singled out for discipline.

Further, the rule to which Respondent adverts makes the first breach punishable by a warning. Since neither Mercado nor Rivera had been involved with an alleged violation of the no-solicitation rule prior to May 12, and if this were, as Respondent contends, the reason for disciplining them, then they deserved nothing more than a warning. Respondent's failure to abide by the terms of its own rule by discharging employees for a first offense reveals that its invocation of the rule was a sham used to mask its true motives which were vindictive and discriminatory.

In an effort to divorce discharges which took place at noon on May 21 from the employees' organizational activities earlier that day, Edd Ahrens and Ruiz testified that the discharge decisions were made on either May 19 or 20. Their testimony is unbelievable. If the decision were made in advance, then Ruiz would have no reason to warn Mercado and Rivera conditionally that they could be fired for flouting company rules on the morning of May 21.

Other reasons for the discharges which were listed in Mercado's and Rivera's termination notices and placed in their personnel files were equally spurious. The notice which Ruiz prepared regarding Mercado's dismissal refers to three incidents which occurred in 1979. It is curious that Mercado's argumentative manner and inability to get along with others, as alleged in memos summarizing these incidents, surfaced as a cause for dismissal only when he became a union advocate. Ruiz reference to an incident allegedly involving a complaint made by Peterson about Rivera was exposed by Peterson's testimony as an offensive distortion of the truth. If Mercado and Rivera were as uncooperative in manner as Respondent suggests, it is difficult to explain why their fellow workers chose them as their representatives.

Respondent's attempt to build a case against these employees by resort to a rule which did not fit the deed, by resurrecting events long since past and by fabricating conduct, produces the reverse effect from the one intended for it raises the inference that the cited reasons for the discharges were not the real reasons. Rather, where, as here, the evidence shows that Respondent was strongly opposed to any collective activity among its employees and repeatedly threatened them with discharge if they persisted in such activity, the real reason for the dismissals of Mercado and Rivera was to purge the plant of its most active union proponents.

C. A Bargaining Order Is Appropriate

There is no dispute as to the authenticity of the employees' signatures on 113 authorization cards, including the cards of 19 employees who, as I found above, are not supervisors. Further, it is agreed that Respondent's work force numbered approximately 118 employees in the relevant time period immediately preceding May 21, the date on which the Union attained a majority. Thus, the record shows that the Union had more than majority support prior to the start of the workday on May 21, 1980.

Respondent contends that the General Counsel failed to prove that the unit described in the complaint is appropriate.[20] I find little merit in this contention.

"It is well established that a unit of production and maintenance employees is presumptively appropriate in the absence of cogent reasons to the contrary." Ultra-Sonic De-Burring, supra at 1067, quoting from Rembrandt Lamp Corporation, 128 NLRB 905, 906 (1960). Moreover, the Board frequently has asserted the validity of a single plant unit. Id.

Other earmarks of an appropriate unit are also evident here. The employees shared a community of interests in that they all were subject to the same terms and conditions of employment, worked under the same supervisory structure, were under the same centralized management, and were engaged in a unified enterprise—the production of a prototype aircraft. Thus, they were bonded by having a common technology and somewhat integrated tasks requiring related skills.

Moreover, although the extent to which the employees have organized may not be a controlling consideration in unit determinations under Section 9(c)(5) of the Act, some weight may be accorded to their expressed desires. See N.L.R.B. v. Morganton Full Fashioned Hosiery Co. and Huffman Full Fashioned Hosiery Mills, Inc., 241 F.2d 913 (4th Cir. 1957). Here, all but five of Respondent's production force registered their interest in having the Union represent them.

Since Respondent has adduced no cogent reasons which would refute the presumption attached to a production and maintenance unit at its plant, I find that unit appropriate.

In N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc., 395 U.S. 575 (1969), the Supreme Court affirmed the Board's authority to issue bargaining orders not only in exceptional cases marked by outrageous and pervasive unfair labor practices, but also in less extraordinary cases where there are fewer "pervasive practices which nonetheless still have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election processes." In determining whether a bargaining order is appropriate in the second category of cases, it is necessary to consider whether the effects of the past unfair labor practices can be erased by the use of traditional remedies and whether there is a likelihood of their reoccurrence. Id. at 614–615 (1969).

Applying these principles to the present case, I conclude, in agreement with the General Counsel, that "employee sentiment once expressed through cards would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order. . . ." Id. at 615.

Respondent argues that, if it committed any unfair labor practices, they were so insignificant as to have no deleterious effect on the election process. It further argues that, since any misconduct occurred the most part prior to the date the Union attained a majority, it could have no dissipating effect on that majority.

The Union was assured of majority support by the start of the workday on May 21. The discharges of Mercado and Rivera came several hours later and thus were a part of Respondent's swift response to the Union's organizational campaign.

The discharge of principal union activists is misconduct which the Board and the courts have long regarded as so serious and coercive as to justify a finding without extensive explication that they are likely to have a lasting inhibitive effect on a substantial percentage of the work force. See N.L.R.B. v. Jamaica Towing Co., 632 F.2d 208 (2d Cir. 1980); Faith Garment Company, Division of Dunhall Pharmaceutical, Inc., 246 NLRB 299 (1979), affd. 630 F.2d 630 (8th Cir. 1980).

The coercive impact of the discharges in this case was augmented by virtue of their timing, coming only several hours after the men had been threatened with discharge for distributing union authorization cards in the presence of a large number of other employees. Moreover, because they were the chosen leaders of the work force, their dismissals had to receive widespread attention. The lesson which Respondent meant to convey to the balance of the work force could not have been lost—the price of active support for the Union was punishment, immediate and severe. It was a lesson not easily forgotten. If Respondent's antipathy to union activity was so intense that it was willing to sacrifice two of its most experienced and highly trained employees, then certainly, less skilled workers would have even more reason to fear a similar fate if they too continued to support the Union. Thus, the unlawful termination of two key union proponents was calculated to quell the employees' prounion sympathies and thereby thwart the Union's drive.

[20] The unit sought is for all production and maintenance employees of Respondent employed at its plant, exclusive of all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

In addition to these discharges, Respondent engaged in a series of other unfair labor practices which are likely to have a lasting effect in the memories of the workers. Thus, Respondent threatened Juan Mendez, Rey Mendez, Luis Nunez, and Linda Santiago with discharge if they became involved in union activities. That such threats may have been made a day or two before the Union attained its majority does not diminish their chilling effect where, as here, the employees could observe that Respondent was willing to convert similar threats into action by discharging Mercado and Rivera. Moreover, the Board has posited that the commission of unfair labor practices before the union's attainment of a majority will not immunize an employer from the issuance of a bargaining order since, by its own actions, the employer has made it uncertain whether the employees can freely elect a bargaining representative. Merritt Motor Company, 181 NLRB 1099, 1106 (1970); Brookland, Inc., 221 NLRB 35, 40 (1975).

Further, as found above, on May 21 Respondent threatened plant closure if employees imposed too many demands on the Company. It is difficult to conceive of a threat more calculated than this to undermine employees' support for a union and by itself is sufficient to vitiate a fair and free election. Ultra-Sonic De-Burring, supra at 1068.

On May 25, Respondent persisted in its unlawful behavior by creating the impression it was surveying the activities of Peter Lugo, by interrogating him about his and other employees' interest in the Union, and by issuing a warning to him supposedly for violating the Company's no-distribution rule but, in fact, because he was engaging in union activity. Just a week before the hearing was held in this case, Respondent again improperly interrogated an employee.

I do not believe that a make-whole remedy and order would suffice to erase from the employees' memories the indelible imprint of Mercado's and Rivera's discharges. Reinstatement and backpay, offered months and possibly years after discriminatory discharges, cannot eradicate the harm that has been done. See N.L.R.B. v. Jamaica Towing Co., supra.

Nor is it likely that a cease-and-desist order posted under Board and perhaps judicial compulsion would root out the coercive effects on employees of Respondent's threats to discharge them or close the plant if they persisted in their union activities. I also am doubtful that such an order would deter Respondent from continuing its unfair labor practices when they were committed not by low-level officers but by four of Respondent's chief officials and where Respondent has not taken even the simple curative step of rescinding its overly broad no-distribution rule. See Justak Brothers and Company, Inc., 253 NLRB 1054 (1980).

The cases cited in Respondent's brief to support the argument that its conduct falls into the third category of Gissel-type cases where no bargaining order is warranted are factually distinguishable from those in the present case. Thus, in White Pine, Inc., 213 NLRB 566 (1974), the union actually won a Board election. Walgreen Company, 221 NLRB 1096 (1975), involved interrogation by a low-level supervisor, a single unlawful reprimand based on an overly broad application of an otherwise valid no-solicitation rule, and an unlawful wage increase which was not specifically related to the employer's antiunion campaign. A bargaining order was denied in Struthers-Dunn, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 574 F.2d 796 (3d Cir. 1978), where a sufficient number of employees withdrew their union authorization cards thereby dissipating the union's majority before the employer's unfair labor practices began. The fourth case relied on by Respondent, Pulley v. N.L.R.B., 395 F.2d 870 (1968), turned on a question of the employer's good faith, which under the Supreme Court's Gissel decision is no longer a relevant consideration, and involved unfair labor practices committed entirely before the union requested recognition. Accordingly, the cases cited by Respondent have no bearing on the facts in the instant case and, therefore, do not derogate from my conclusion that the cumulative effects of Respondent's unfair labor practices are so pervasive and severe as to undermine any expectation that a fair election could be held.

Respondent argues that a remedial order is unwarranted in this case and urges that the complaint should be dismissed in its entirety because, for legitimate economic reasons, operations at its plant have been at a standstill since the end of May 1980.

There is no dispute that a delay in receiving further financial assistance from the Government and other investment sources compelled Respondent to lay off 80 percent of its work force in June 1980 and, to date, it continues to function with only a skeletal staff. However, Respondent stressed in its pleadings that it is making ardent efforts to obtain a Federal loan and that its negotiations looked promising. Further, Respondent indicated that FAA approval of its aircraft was imminent and that, with this approval, final sales of planes on order could be culminated. Moreover, Respondent stated that it would fully reactivate its Aguadilla plant as soon as economically feasible and would then recall its former employees. Indeed, given the Company's need for skilled employees, it would be costly not to rehire them. Thus, although it appears at this juncture that Respondent is not in a position to predict precisely when the anticipated funding will materalize or when its doors will reopen, it also would be premature to suggest that it has shut down permanently so as to make a bargaining order futile.

In cases such as this, where the union has not made a bargaining demand, the Board has tied the effective date of the bargaining order to the date on which the employer initiated its campaign of unfair labor practices if, as of that date, the union obtained majority support. Rodeway Inn of Las Vegas, 252 NLRB 344 (1980); see also Boatel Alaska, Inc., 236 NLRB 1458 (1978); Ultra Sonic De-Burring, Inc., supra at 165. Although some of the unfair labor practices which make a bargaining order appropriate here occurred prior to the date the Union attained its majority, in accordance with the Board's approach, I conclude that the bargaining order should be retroactive to May 21, 1980.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. At all material times, Ariel Berrios, Adalberto Cuadrado, Hiram Enchautegui, Julio Lopez, Manuel Lopez, Melvin Martinez, Juan Mendez, Eduardo Mercado, George Montalvo, Abraham Mora, Nicolas Ramirez, Wilfredo Ramos, Freddy Rivera, Luis Rivera, Neftali Rodriguez, Ivan Salas, Alfredo Sosa, and Jose Valentino were employees within the meaning of the Act.

4. Commencing on May 21, 1980, and continuing thereafter, the Union was designated by a majority of Respondent's employees in the unit described above as their exclusive bargaining representative.

5. Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees with plant closure; by maintaining and applying an overly broad no-distribution rule; by threatening employees with discharge if they joined a union; by instructing employees they could not join a union; by creating the impression they were engaged in surveillance of an employee's union activity; by interrogating that employee about his and other employees' interest in the union and disciplining him because of his participation in union activity; and by interrogating an employee without proper assurances that his participation was voluntary and no reprisals would be imposed.

6. The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of the Act:

> All production and maintenance employees of Respondent employed at its plant, exclusive of all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act.

7. Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging employees Eduardo Mercado and Freddy Rivera on May 21, 1980.

8. The Union has been at all times since May 21, 1980, and still is, the exclusive bargaining representative of such employees within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

9. By its violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, as reviewed above, Respondent has prevented a free and fair election. Therefore, to best serve the purposes of the Act, Respondent is required to recognize and bargain with the Union as of May 21, 1980, the date by which a majority of employees has signed authorization cards designating the Union as its exclusive bargaining agent, concerning the rates of pay, wages, hours, and working conditions of unit employees.

10. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has violated the Act in certain respects, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to cease and desist therefrom. Because Respondent has committed a number of serious and pervasive violations of the Act through its vice president and other top-level supervisors, I conclude that, unless restrained, Respondent is likely to engage in continuing unlawful efforts in the future to prevent its employees from engaging in union and protected concerted activity. Accordingly, Respondent will be required to refrain from in any other manner infringing on employees' rights to engage in such activity. Hickmott Foods, Inc., 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

Respondent has stated its intention to resume operations when and if it obtains sufficient funding. Therefore, when Respondent does resume such operations,[21] it will be required to offer Eduardo Mercado and Freddy Rivera reinstatement to the jobs of which they were unlawfully deprived or, if such jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed. Franklin Fouts, d/b/a B & F Cartage, 251 NLRB 645 (1980). Further, Respondent will be ordered to make Rivera and Mercado whole forthwith for any loss of pay they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, less net earnings, from the date of their discharges, May 21, 1980, to such date as Respondent demonstrates during the compliance stage of this proceeding that they might have been laid off in the normal course of its business, less net earnings, to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as called for in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). In addition, Respondent will be required to bargain with the Union on request, such bargaining to be retroactive to May 21, 1981, the date on which the Union attained a majority among Respondent's employees. Rodeway Inn of Las Vegas, 252 NLRB 344 (1980); Beasley Energy, Inc. d/b/a Peaker Run Coal Company, Ohio Division #1, 228 NLRB 93 (1977).

Although most of the employees who testified at the hearing in this case were fluent in English, Spanish is nonetheless the native language of many Ahrens' employees. Therefore, Respondent will be required to mail to all those employees, including Rivera and Mercado, who were employed as of May 21, 1980, copies of the notice attached hereto in Spanish as well as English. Respondent also shall post said notice in appropriate places at its plant.

[21] Respondent shall offer reinstatement to Mercado and Rivera as soon as appropriate positions become available whether or not there has been a full-scale resumption of its operations.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[22]

The Respondent, Ahrens Aircraft, Inc., Aquadilla, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Threatening employees with discharge or plant closure in order to dissuade them from supporting a union or otherwise engaging in protected concerted activities.

(b) Discharging, warning, or otherwise discriminating against employees with regard to any term or condition of employment for engaging in activities on behalf of a labor organization or for engaging in any activity protected by Section 7 of the Act.

(c) Creating the impression of surveillance of employees' union activities, interrogating employees regarding their union activities, or instructing employees that they are ineligible to join a union.

(d) Interrogating employees without advising them that their responses are voluntary and that they will suffer no reprisals.

(e) Maintaining and applying an overly braod rule which unlawfully prohibits the distribution by employees of unauthorized materials on company property during nonworking hours.

(f) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) As soon as Respondent resumes its aircraft assembly operations or has appropriate jobs, whichever comes first, offer Eduardo Mercado and Frederick Rivera reinstatement to the jobs of which they were unlawfully deprived or, if such jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole forthwith for any loss of pay they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in that part of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Upon request, recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit and embody in a signed agreement any agreement reached.

(c) Post at its Aguadilla, Puerto Rico, plant copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[23] Copies of said notice in English and Spanish, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 24, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material. DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On May 13, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Jesse Kleiman issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief,[1] and the Charging Party filed cross-exceptions and a brief in support of its cross-exceptions and in opposition to Respondent's exceptions. Respondent also filed a brief in answer to the Charging Party's cross-exceptions.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JESSE KLEIMAN, Administrative Law Judge: Upon a charge filed in Case 29–CA–6398 on May 8, 1978, by New York State Nurses Association, also referred to herein either as the Association or as NYSNA, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 29, Brooklyn, New York, duly issued a complaint and notice of hearing on June 15, 1978, against North Shore University Hospital, herein called the Respondent, alleging that the Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, herein referred to as the Act. On July 17, 1978,[1] the Respondent, by counsel, duly filed an answer denying the material allegations in the complaint and raising certain affirmative defenses.[2]

[1] The Respondent's time to serve an answer was extended to this date by the Regional Director for Region 29 by order dated June 27, 1978.

259 NLRB No. 121

Prior thereto, on September 26, 1977, the Association had filed a petition for certification of representative with the Board in Case 29-RC-3989 seeking an election among all the Respondent's full-time and regular part-time registered professional nurses and persons authorized by permit to practice as registered professional nurses excluding "managerial, confidential and supervisory employees as defined by the Act, guards, watchmen and all other employees." The parties executed a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election on October 7, 1977. By order dated November 11, 1977, the Regional Director for Region 29 denied the Respondent's motion to reopen the hearing in Case 29-RC-3989 or in the alternative to withdraw from the Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election.[3]

An election by secret ballot was conducted on November 16, 1977, among all the Respondent's unit employees in which 368 votes were cast for the Association, 96 votes cast against the participating labor organization, and 15 ballots were challenged. On November 23, 1977, the Respondent filed timely objections to the election alleging, in substance, that the Association is not a labor organization within the meaning of the Act because its actions are controlled, directed, and/or influenced by persons who occupy supervisory positions within health care institutions including the Respondent and that the Board has no jurisdiction, therefore, and if the Association is a labor organization under the Act, it committed "objectionable pre-election conduct" by obtaining employee support under the "false pretense" that it is a "professional organization as distinguished from a union and/or labor organization." The Regional Director for Region 29 on January 23, 1978, issued a report on objections in which he recommended that each of the Respondent's objections be overruled and that a Certification of Representative issue to the Association.[4] The Respondent filed no exceptions to the report on objections.

The Board on February 21, 1978, certified the Association as the exclusive representative of all the employees in the appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment.[5]

On July 17, 1978, the Respondent filed a motion to revoke certification in Case 29-RC-3989 alleging inter alia that the Association is "influenced, dominated and controlled by supervisors who serve as both officers and directors of the Association, which [the Association] has not delegated its bargaining authority to an autonomous local chapter" and therefore that the Association is not a bona fide labor organization. By order dated August 9, 1978, the Regional Director for Region 29, at the request of the parties, consolidated Cases 29-CA-6398 and 29-RC-3989 for the purposes of hearing.

A hearing in the consolidated cases was duly held before me in Brooklyn, New York, commencing on November 27, 1978, and concluding on March 23, 1979.[6] At the commencement of the hearing, during its course, and at the conclusion thereof, various motions were made by the parties.[7] In substance these motions were as follows: The Respondent moved that its motion to revoke certification in Case 29-RC-3989 be granted and for dismissal

> (1) New York State Nurses Association "is not a bona fide labor organization qualified to be the unit employees' exclusive collective bargaining representative within the meaning of the Act because its actions are controlled, directed, dominated and/or influenced by persons who occupy supervisory positions within health care institutions, including Respondent."
> (2) By demanding that Respondent bargain and enter into a collective bargaining agreement with the Association, the Association has engaged and is engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and Sections 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The Respondent filed an amended answer herein on July 24, 1978.

[3] The Regional Director for Region 29 denied the motion for the following reasons: That it was not timely made since it was filed long after the election agreement was entered into and approved and there was no evidence that the issues raised then could not have been raised at the time the election agreement was signed, Nebraska Methodist Hospital, 218 NLRB 619 (1975); that no extraordinary circumstances were present to warrant a hearing at this time and that the Board had found the Association to be a labor organization in previous cases and the Respondent had not indicated that it had any evidence to refute this, albeit it was seeking to reopen the hearing on the basis that the Association was dominated by "management and/or supervisory personnel with respect to its representation activity and concerning the status of the [Association] as a labor organization," Catholic Medical Center of Brooklyn and Queens, Inc., St. John's Hospital Division, Case 29-RC-3738; Maimonides Hospital Center, Case 29-UC-89; The New York State Nurses Association, 232 NLRB 849 (1977); and that, in the event that the Association is certified by the Board, a motion to revoke the certification could be filed or the issue considered in an appropriate unfair labor practice proceeding. Sierra Vista Hospital, Inc., 225 NLRB 1086 (1976); Handy Andy, Inc., 228 NLRB 447 (1977).

[4] The Regional Director for Region 29 found that the Respondent's "objections" addressed to the Association's status as a bona fide labor organization "are not objections" as defined in Sec. 102.69 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, and that "Under established Board policy, the Employer may revive the issue by a motion to revoke the labor organization's certification or in an appropriate unfair labor practice proceeding." Sisters of Charity of Providence, St. Ignatius Province, d/b/a St. Patrick Hospital, 225 NLRB 799 (1976), Sierra Vista Hospital, supra; Handy Andy, Inc., supra.

[5] The unit found appropriate by the Board for the purposes of collective bargaining was:

> All full-time and regular part-time registered professional nurses regularly scheduled to work 22-1/2 hours or more per week, including all those authorized by permit to practice as registered nurses, employed by the employer at 300 Community Drive, Manhasset, New York; excluding all department heads, administrative directors, directors, associate directors, assistant directors, all supervisors, clinical supervisors, all clinicians, all instructors, all specialists, operating rooms nurse specialists, all coordinators, head nurses, assistant head nurses, all casual employees, temporary employees, confidential employees, managerial employees, all other employees, and guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The complaint alleges, the Respondent's answer admits, and, as the Board previously found in Case 29-RC-3981, I find that the above-described unit is appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Sec. 9(b) of the Act.

[6] The hearing covered 29 days with a record of 3,733 pages and a substantial number of exhibits.

[7] It should be noted that the General Counsel maintained a somewhat unique position of "neutrality" concerning both the procedural aspects of the hearing and the substantive issues presented therein despite its burden of proof with regard to the allegations set forth in the complaint. However, counsel for the General Counsel did move at the beginning of the hearing to strike the second affirmative defense in the Respondent's answer which alleges that by demanding bargaining and the execution of a collective-bargaining agreement the Association engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Secs. 8(b)(1)(A) and 2(6) and (7) of the Act. I reserved decision on this motion. As the reason therefor will become apparent from the subsequent discussion herein of the issues in this case, I find the Respondent's second affirmative defense to be without merit and grant the motion to strike this defense.

of the complaint in Case 29-CA-6398; the Association moved for a dismissal of the Respondent's motion to revoke certification and that the complaint herein be sustained, seeking a bargaining order and several extraordinary remedies in addition thereto. I initially denied these motions and upon the renewal thereof reserved decision thereon. The Respondent also moved to amend the first affirmative defense in its amended answer and its motion to revoke certification to include therein "managerial" as well as "supervisory" employees in alleging unlawful control, direction, domination, and/or influence of the Association by persons occupying such positions within health care institutions including the Respondent's hospital. I granted the Respondent's motion to amend.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally on the record, and to file briefs. Thereafter, briefs were filed by the Respondent and the Association.[8] In its brief the Respondent seeks dismissal of the complaint and the granting of its motion to revoke the Association's certification. The Association in its brief asserts that

> . . . the Hospital's Motion to Revoke the Association's Certification should be denied and the Hospital should be ordered to bargain in good faith with the Association. In addition, as the Hospital's "domination" defense is plainly frivolous, the Association should be awarded the extraordinary relief specified at p. 78, supra or alternatively, the record should be reopened to receive the evidence of the Hospital's election interference and unfair labor practices specified in the Association's offer of proof, pp. 79-82, supra.[9]

For the reasons hereinafter set forth I deny the Respondent's motions both to revoke certification in Case 29-RC-3989 and to dismiss the complaint in Case 39-CA-6398 in their entirety, and grant the Association's motions concerning the above but only in part as to the remedy the Association seeks therein, as hereinafter set forth.

Upon the entire record and the briefs of the parties, and upon my observation of the witnesses, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

The Respondent, at all times material herein, has been a corporation organized under and existing by virtue of the laws of the State of New York, maintaining its principal office and place of business at 300 Community Drive, in the town of Manhasset, county of Nassau, and State of New York, where it is, and has been at all times material herein, continuously engaged in the operation of a hospital and in providing hospital and health care services and related services. In the course and conduct of the Respondent's business operations during the preceding 12 months, these operations being representative of the operations at all times material herein, the Respondent derived gross revenues therefrom in excess of $250,000 and purchased and caused to be transported and delivered to its Manhasset hospital medical supplies, goods, and equipment valued in excess of $50,000 in interstate commerce directly from States of the United States other than the State of New York. The complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that the Respondent is now, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Respondent alleges that the New York State Nurses Association,

> . . . is not a bona fide labor organization qualified to be the unit employees' exclusive collective bargaining representative within the meaning of the Act because its actions are controlled, directed, dominated and/or influenced by persons who occupy supervisory and/or management positions within health care institutions and/or other institutions.

The Respondent therefore maintains that since the Association is not a "bona fide" organization under the Act[10] it cannot "be forced to bargain" with the Association. The Respondent further asserts that the Association is not, albeit its certification by the Board as the bargaining representative of the Respondent's nurses in an appropriate unit, "qualified to remain the bargaining representative of a unit which is dominated, controlled and influenced by supervisors both at [North Shore University Hospital] and at other institutions through the [Association]." The Association contends that it is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act and as such is fully qualified to act as the collective-bargaining representative of the nurses' unit at the Respondent's hospital pursuant to the Board's certification thereof.

[8] Robert H. Jones III, counsel for the Association, died on October 24, 1979, and in view of this and the length of the record in this proceeding, the Association's time to file briefs was extended to April 17, 1980.

[9] The following extraordinary remedies are sought by the Association:

(1) expenses incurred in the investigation, preparation, presentation, and conduct of these cases, including reasonable counsel fees, witness fees, transcript and record costs, travel expenses and per diem, and other reasonable costs and expenses;

(2) the Hospital should be ordered to mail copies of the "Notice to Employees" to each of the employees in the bargaining unit at his or her home;

(3) the Hospital's Personnel Administrator should be ordered personally to read the "Notice to Employees" to the members of the bargaining unit of the Hospital, in the presence of representatives of the Association and the Board;

(4) the Association should be granted access to the Hospital's bulletin boards and premises during the entire period of contract negotiations;

(5) all terms of any contract agreed to in collective bargaining, including but not limited to wages and benefits, should be made retroactive to the date of the election;

(6) the Hospital should be ordered to reimburse the Association for lost dues and initiation fees since the election and to reimburse employee-members who have paid such dues and initiation fees to the Association while the Hospital was engaged in its unlawful refusal to bargain.

[10] Sec. 2(5) of the Act, as amended.

The question of statutory labor organization status is, however, distinct from the question of a statutory labor organization's qualifications to act as a bargaining representative in all instances and without regard to the circumstances under which bargaining takes place or will take place.[11] As the Board held in Sierra Vista Hospital, Inc., 241 NLRB 631 (1979):

> [T]he mere presence of supervisors in a labor organization is virtually irrelevant to determining status under Section 2(5) of the Act. Indeed, we have, with court approval, uniformly construed Section 2(5) to reach all associations which exist for the purpose, in whole or in part, of collective bargaining and which admit employees to membership, despite the fact that supervisors, in addition to employees and even in substantial numbers, may likewise be admitted.[14]
> As long as nurse-employees participate in the association and one of its purposes is representing employees in collective bargaining, a nurses' association, like any other, meets the definition of "labor organization" in Section 2(5) of the Act.[[12]]

---

[14] International Organization of Masters, Mates and Pilots of America, Inc., AFL-CIO (Chicago Calumet Stevedoring Co., Inc.), 144 NLRB 1172, 1177 (1963).

The evidence herein clearly shows that the Association is an organization in which employees meaningfully participate and which exists in part for the purpose of dealing with employers concerning wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment; and that it has, in fact, negotiated collective-bargaining agreements with employers.[13] Accordingly, I find that the New York State Nurses Association is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.[14]

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES[15]

The complaint alleges, in substance, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act[16] by refus-

[11] The issue of the Association's qualifications to act as the bargaining representative of the Respondent's nurses in an appropriate unit will be considered in a different part of this Decision.

Also see Sav-On Drugs, Inc., 243 NLRB 859 (1979).

[13] Catheryne Welch, the Association's deputy director for programs, testified uncontradictedly that at the time of the hearing the Association had about 29,000 registered professional nurse members of whom approximately 25,000 are represented by it for purposes of collective bargaining in approximately 115 bargaining units at public and private health care and related facilities located throughout New York State. Further, the Association's certificate of incorporation was amended in or about 1950 to add, as an additional purpose, the power to act as the collective-bargaining representative of registered professional nurses with their employers concerning wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment. Also see Welch's testimony regarding the participation of the nurses in the collective-bargaining process as will be more fully set forth hereinafter.

[14] Additionally, it should be noted that the Board has previously found The Association to be a labor organization within the meaning of the Act. The New York State Nurses Association, 232 NLRB 849 (1977). Also see Lutheran Medical Center, Case 29-RC-4543 (1979); Jewish Hospital Medical Center of Brooklyn Nursing Home, Case 29-RC-4528 (1979); The Catholic Medical Center of Brooklyn and Queens, Inc., St. John's Queens Hospital Division, Case 29-RC-3738 (1977).

[15] The Association in its brief asserts that:

> The Hospital in this proceeding is seeking to raise issues concerning the propriety of the Association's representation of its registered nurses long after those very issues were waived by the Hospital by its entering into the Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election. To even consider the merits of the Hospital's contention at this time would violate a long line of NLRB decisions forbidding the wasteful practice of litigating allegations which could have been asserted but which were waived by an employer. The fact is that the Hospital, with competent legal counsel advising it, stipulated to an election.
> A respondent in a Section 8(a)(5) proceeding is not entitled to relitigate issues which were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding.

The Association cites a multitude of cases in support of its assertion which correctly stand for the proposition against relitigation, i.e., R. W. Harmon & Sons, Inc., 246 NLRB 223 (1979); H. M. Patterson & Son, Inc., 245 NLRB 1412 (1979); The Standard Register Company, 243 NLRB 300 (1979); Colorflo Decorator Products, Inc., 240 NLRB 1134 (1979); Gould, Inc., Electrical Components Division, 237 NLRB 66 (1978).

However, the Board's Supplemental Decision and Order in Sierra Vista Hospital, Inc., supra, compels a rejection of the Association's above contention in this matter. A procedural account of what transpired in the various Sierra Vista Hospital cases is instructive:

After a hearing held in Cases 1-RC-3166 the Regional Director directed an election in a unit consisting of registered nurses. Sierra Vista Hospital, Inc., the employer therein, filed a request for review of the Regional Director's decision. The Board denied the employer's request for review "as it raised no substantial issues," and noted that "in the event the Petitioner is certified and does not delegate its bargaining authority to a local autonomous chapter controlled by nonsupervisory employees, a motion to revoke the certification will be entertained." The election was held, the California Nurses Association (CNA) won, and the Board certified it as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employer's registered nurses in an appropriate unit. The employer then filed with the Board a motion to revoke certification alleging that the CNA had failed to delegate its bargaining authority to a local autonomous chapter controlled by nonsupervisory employees. The Board remanded the case to the Regional Director to adduce further evidence, particularly concerning the CNA's negotiating procedure and the degree of participation of supervisory nurses in the bargaining process. Thereafter the Board denied the employer's motion to revoke certification as being unmeritorious. (225 NLRB 1086 (1976).)

The employer refused to bargain with CNA, and the latter consequently filed a charge in Case 31-CA-5760, upon which the Regional Director issued a complaint alleging that the employer had violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment, which was granted by the Board (229 NLRB 232, 233 (1977)). The Board stated therein:

> It thus appears that Respondent is attempting to raise in the instant unfair labor practice proceeding matters which were raised and resolved in the underlying representation case.
> It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues which were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding.[4] [None of the above circumstances were shown to be present or applicable.]

Thereafter in view of the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in N.L.R.B. v. Annapolis Emergency Hospital Association, Inc., d/b/a Anne Arundel General Hospital, 561 F.2d 524 (1977), the Board requested the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, before which the Sierra Vista Hospital, Inc., case (Case 31-CA-5750) was now pending vis-a-vis, petition and cross-petition for review and for enforcement, respectively, to remand the case to the Board for reconsidering and continuing to refuse to recognize and bargain collectively with the Association as the Board-certified exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees in an appropriate unit. The Respondent denies these allegations and asserts as an affirmative defense that the Association is not qualified to act as the collective-bargaining representative of the nurses in the appropriate unit because the Association is dominated, controlled, directed, and/or influenced by persons who occupy supervisory and/or managment positions within the Respondent's hospital and/or other health care institutions.

A. Background

As set forth hereinbefore, the Board certified the Association as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's registered professional nurses in an appropriate unit on February 21, 1978. On or about April 18, 1978, the Association requested the Respondent to recognize it as the bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees in the nurses' unit and to bargain collectively with it with respect to these employees' rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment. The Respondent, on or about April 21, 1978, and continuing thereafter, refused and continues to refuse to recognize and bargain with the Association. As legal justification for its actions the Respondent maintains that the Association is disqualified from acting as the collective-bargaining representative of its registered professional nurse employees in the appropriate unit because the Association's "actions are controlled, directed, dominated and/or influenced by persons who occupy supervisory and/or managerial positions within health care institutions, including Respondent."

B. The Evidence[17]

The New York State Nurses Association is a professional membership corporation created and existing under the not-for-profit corporation law of the State of New York, admitting into membership any person "licensed or otherwise duly authorized to practice as a registered professional nurse."[18] The Association's primary objective is "to further the efficient care of the sick, disabled and others needing nursing care." As a secondary purpose and to assist in effectuating its primary objective the Association seeks "to advance the educational and professional standards of nursing" and as one of the means to this end "concerns itself with the economic and general welfare of nurses" through representation of licensed professional nurse units for purposes of collective bargaining.[19]

1. The organization of the Association

a. The Association's board of directors

The Association is governed by a 13-member elected board of directors which establishes the major administrative policies under which the Association's goals, through its programing, are accomplished. The members of the board of directors are elected by the voting body which consists of all member registered professional nurses in good standing (validly licensed as nurses and have paid Association dues).[20] The board of directors of ation. The court granted the Board's request and remanded the case to it. The Board then decided to reopen the representation proceeding (Case 31-RC-3166) and consolidate it with the unfair labor practice proceeding (Case 31-CA-5760) in order to reconsider the issues posed therein, disavowing and discarding its previous "conditional certification approach" to resolving the problems created by the participation of supervisors in nurses associations as labor organizations and setting forth the standards by which to thereafter resolve such issues as will be discussed more fully hereinafter. The Board's order therein rescinded its prior decisions and orders in Case 31-RC-3166 and Case 31-CA-5750 and directed that a hearing be held for the purpose of receiving evidence "to resolve issues raised by Respondent's motion to revoke certification in Case 31-RC-3166, namely, whether or not the presence of supervisors as officers in, on the board of directors of, or in other positions of authority to speak for or bargain on behalf of CNA disqualifies that association as the collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's nonsupervisory nurses." (241 NLRB 631, 635 (1979).)

The obvious similarity between what occurred therein and what occurred in the instant case, excepting the consent election stipulation herein, is clear. Since the decision in the Sierra Vista Hospital, Inc. case came after the hearing was concluded in the instant case and dictates a need for considering the effect, if any, that supervisors or managers, who are members, have upon the NYSNA's collective-bargaining functions, I do not find that the Respondent waived its right to present such evidence, especially in view of the necessity imposed by Sierra Vista upon the Respondent to meet a "heavy burden" of establishing the disqualification of the Association as a certified collective-bargaining representative because of a "danger of a conflict of interest interfering with the collective-bargaining process," by entering into a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election in the representation case. It might well be argued that what procedurally occurred herein has created "special circumstances" warranting the holding of such a hearing.

Normally, pursuant to Sierra Vista Hospital, the hearing would have been held in the representation case upon remand to the Regional Director by the Board pursuant to the Respondent's motion to revoke certification. But in the instant case the parties themselves requested that the representation case and the unfair labor practice case, Cases 31-RC-3166 and 31-CA-5750, respectively, be consolidated and set for formal hearing before an administrative law judge, which was done.

In view of all of the above, consideration of the merits of the issues presented herein does not violate the Board's "relitigation prohibition." This is not to say that future cases involving challenges to the qualification of nurses associations on the basis of alleged supervisory or managerial nomination will not require employers to raise and litigate these very issues within the confines of the representation case now that Sierra Vista Hospital is applicable thereto. In fact, the Board's Second Supplemental Decision and Order in Case 31-RC-3166 (249 NLRB 602 (1980)), and its Notice To Show Cause in Case 31-CA-5750 (249 NLRB 603 (1980)), both involving the Sierra Vista Hospital, Inc., and CNA, strongly indicates that this will be so.

[16] Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act prohibits an employer from refusing to bargain collectively with the collective-bargaining representative of its employees. Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act prohibits an employer from interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Sec. 7 of the Act.

[17] It should be noted that most of the evidence presented herein, whether in the form of sworn testimony or documentary exhibits, was generally uncontradicted in the record.

[18] The parties herein stipulated that among the Association's membership are persons who would be supervisors as defined in the Act, having the same voting rights and privileges as members as do the nonsupervisory member nurses.

[19] See the testimony of the Association's executive director, Veronica Driscoll, and its deputy director for programs and main witness at the hearing, Catheryne Welch.

[20] The evidence shows that the regular employment positions held by various of the directors include "clinical nursing specialist, research associate, director of nursing, assistant professor of nursing, supervisor of a county health department, associate director for continuing education, the Association, besides establishing administrative policy, also determines membership qualifications, dues requirements, the Association's administrative and program budget, and appoints members to various standing committees.[21] The Association's programs cover the areas of nursing education, nursing practice and services, legislation, economic and general welfare, and organization services.[22]

b. The Association's staff

The administrative programing functions of the Association are performed by a staff of paid full-time employees, who are usually themselves licensed professional nurses,[23] and who are not employed by any hospital or health care facility or in fact by any other employer. The Association's chief executive administrative officer is its executive director, who is responsible for implementing all of the Association's program activities including the "Economic and General Welfare Program," also referred to herein as the EGWP, which we are particularly concerned with herein.[24] The executive director is assisted in her duties by a deputy director for programs and a deputy director for administration who are responsible, respectively, for coordinating the Association's program activities and administrative functions. The deputy directors are in turn assisted by the administrative and program staff of the Association. Activities in each of the Association's four major programs are coordinated by program directors, each of whom is immediately responsible to the deputy director for programs.[25]

C. The Association's Economic and General Welfare Program

The EGWP under which the Association's collective-bargaining functions are conducted is organized on the basis of four geographical regions within the State of New York. Each region is headed by a regional coordinator who reports to the EGWP director. These regions are additionally staffed by nursing and labor relations representatives who provide assistance to nurses in organizing bargaining units and in negotiating and administering collective-bargaining agreements. The Association's executive director hires all the above employees.[26] The Association also has a "Council on Economic and General Welfare," herein called the Council. The members thereto are appointed by the board of directors and staffing is provided by the director of the program. The Council makes recommendations to the board of directors in the areas covered by the Association's EGWP and serves as an advisory body to the Association's EGWP staff.

The Association's collective-bargaining process functions as follows:

> Nurses at a hospital or other health care related facility will contact the Association for preliminary advice and guidance concerning representation. If the Association determines that it is able to provide the requested representational services, it assigns staff members, "nursing representative" and a "labor relations representative," to assist the nurses in accomplishing their representational goal. The nursing and labor relations representatives will meet with the interested nurses, hold organizational meetings to advise the nurses as to the scope of the Association's program, the manner in which it is conducted and the potential outcome for certification and bargaining, and provide any necessary technical guidance and assistance required, i.e., the how and wherefore of obtaining signed authorization cards, etc.

Following Board certification of the Association as the collective-bargaining representative of the nurses in the appropriate unit,[27] the Association provides the nurses unit with technical assistance in the form of model department head for surgical nursing, etc." While the Association maintains, as a general proposition, that the definition of "supervisor" under the Act is not applicable to licensed professional nursing positions below the title of assistant director of nursing of hospital and health care related institutions, it admitted for purposes of this proceeding that "statutory supervisors" have in the past, are presently, and can in the future be elected to membership on its board of directors, and while no supervisory or managerial employee from the Respondent's hospital has ever been elected as a director it is conceivable that this could happen.

[21] The record shows that the Association's board of directors has never included as a member any supervisory or managerial employee employed by the Respondent. Additionally, albeit there have been in the past and now are presently on the board of directors supervisors and managerial employees employed by other hospitals and health care related institutions, the Respondent introduced no evidence which showed that any of these members interfered with, dominated, influenced, or controlled any of the Association's collective-bargaining activities, or that the board members who were supervisors at some competing hospital acted in any way so as to create any conflict of interest, nor that these board members had any motive to compromise the interests of employee-nurses.

Concerning the board of directors' input into the Association's bargaining process, Welch testified that she knew of no instance in which the board of directors vetoed, prohibited, or overrode any decision of any bargaining unit or even considered doing so nor any instance in which the board countermanded a staff decision.

The evidence herein does show however that, in 1977, the Association's board of directors established a special voluntary $12 "service fee" to be paid by nurses represented by the Association to "assist in providing additional financial resources for implementing the collective bargaining program." This voluntary "fee" was discontinued by the board of directors after 1 year when it was determined that a dues increase which it had approved for submission to the Association's voting body would provide any needed financial support of the program.

[22] The Association also has support services such as, library, research and publications, and public relations.

[23] However, there are exceptions such as the librarian, public relations personnel, and the labor relations representative.

[24] This program encompasses the Association's labor relations functions.

[25] See C.P. Exh. 8(b) in evidence (Association's organizational chart).

[26] The Association's "Organizational Chart—Economic and General Welfare Program" shows that the EGWP is headed by its director, followed by its regional coordinator (there is one regional coordinator for each of the 4 goegraphical regions in New York State), and then its nursing representative and labor relations representative (the number of nursing and labor relations representatives varies in each geographical area based on need and availability of trained personnel in these fields).

[27] The particular unit of nurses represented by the Association at a hospital or other health care related facility is referred to by the Association as a Council of Nursing Practitioners although at what stage of the collective-bargaining process this title becomes effective is not clear from the record. These nurses units or "councils" always exclude therefrom statutory supervisors and managerial employees in pursuance of the Act and Board policy.

"rules" suggesting guidelines designed to help them conceive a working structure, i.e., election of unit officers, establishing unit employee committees, and defining committee responsibilities, preparation of bylaws, etc.[28] The nominating committee is elected from among the nurses in the bargaining unit who then elect officers from a slate of candidates prepared by the committee also from among the unit nurses. The negotiating committee is usually constituted from the elected bargaining unit officers or from among the bargaining unit nurses.

In preparation for collective bargaining with the employer the unit nurses develop their own contract proposals through consultation with the Association's nursing and labor relations representatives and through solicitation thereof from the bargaining unit nurses themselves. The bargaining unit decides which of these proposals will be submitted to the employer as demands by the negotiating committee.[29] Contract negotiations themselves are conducted by the negotiating committee with the assistance of the Association's nursing and labor relations representatives as a collective-bargaining team with the labor relations representative often functioning as the "primary negotiator on behalf of the nurses unit."[30]

When negotiations are completed, unit members vote whether to accept or reject the agreement. If the nursing unit approves the contract, the Association generally takes responsibility for the technical aspects of reducing the agreement to written contract form. The agreement is typed, reproduced, and sent back to the unit for review by the nurses unit's representatives and the Association's labor relations representative for accuracy and completeness. If the agreement conforms to the nurses unit's understanding of what was agreed to in the negotiations, the contract is submitted to the employer and to the Association's executive director for execution. Although the executive director generally signs the collective-bargaining agreement on behalf of the Association, he does not have the authority to reject an agreement and her execution thereof "simply signifies that she is satisfied that the agreement conforms to what the bargaining unit has actually negotiated."[31] The record herein indicates that the above procedure was substantially followed in the Association's initial organizing of the nurses employed at the Respondent's hospital and up through the election and its certification by the Board.

d. The Association's nominating committee

Pursuant to the Association's bylaws, the duties of the nominating committee are to notify the Association's membership and its "constituent district nursing associations" of the offices to be filled, evaluate persons whose names have been submitted for office, prepare slates of candidates for such offices, and notify the Association's membership of the opportunity to vote as to their selections.[32] It is clear that the nominating committee is one of importance with its members having "great responsibility."[33] The five members of this committee are elected through secret mail ballot by the entire membership of the Association.

The evidence shows that in 1977 the nominating committee included Marilyn McClellan, admittedly a supervisory employee (assistant director, staff development, University of Rochester School of Nursing),[34] and Catherine Foster, whom the Respondent employs and alleges to be a supervisor under the Act.[35]

e. Special committees

Evidence was offered by the Respondent concerning particular "Special Committees" and "Task Forces." Members of the "Special Committees" and "Task Forces" of the Association are appointed by the board of directors. The "Special Committee to Consider Concerns of Directors of Nursing Practice and Services" was created to study the impact of the Association's collective-bargaining activities upon the right of directors of nursing services to full participation in the activities of the Association and whether the collective-bargaining program of the Association should be separate, in effect, whether there should be two associations. The committee recommended, in substance, that there be continued "full participation by Directors of Nursing Practices and Services" in the Association, that legal assistance be provided to any director of nursing forced or coerced to resign from membership in the Association, and that the Association develop a model employment contract for directors of nursing and assist them in securing such contracts. While there was some dispute among the parties as to just how many members of this committee were supervisory employees, it is clear that at least two of the six members were.[36]

[28] According to the uncontradicted testimony of Catheryne Welch, each nurses unit makes the ultimate decisions as to what rules to adopt and the method for establishing nominating and negotiating committees. Further, Welch testified that the Association does not advise the unit as to who should be on these committees nor does it have a vote in the establishment thereof.

[29] Welch testified uncontravertedly that the proposals to be negotiated during collective bargaining with the employer are determined by the nurses units themselves, not the Association's nursing or labor relations representatives, and are not submitted to the Association for approval. Even when Association staff are conducting negotiations, their authority to bargain on behalf of the unit is always limited by the ultimate authority of the nurses unit to authorize the negotiation of all proposals and to accept or reject proposed modifications of unit proposals.

[30] According to the evidence, even though the labor relations representative may assume the function of primary negotiator because of his expertise in this area, the negotiating committee may preclude this if the nurses unit so desires.

[31] Both Catheryne Welch, the Association's deputy director for program, and Jeanette Coane, employed by the Association as a nursing representative, testified that they knew of no instance in which the Association's executive director, or anyone authorized to sign a collective-bargaining agreement on her behalf, had refused to execute a bargaining agreement submitted for such signature.

[32] See the testimony of Catheryne Welch.

[34] Geographically, the school of nursing is located over 300 miles from the Respondent's hospital.

[35] While the Association does not concede Foster's supervisory status, it maintains that even if she were a statutory supervisor this would have no effect on its ability to represent the Respondent's nurses in an appropriate unit for purposes of collective bargaining. It should be noted that Foster was chairwoman of this committee and at the same time was also president of District 14.

[36] Louise Pam and Audrey Byrnes.

The "Task Force on Impediments to Quality Nursing Care" was created to prepare, for submission to the Association's voting body, a report concerning the Association's no-strike policy. The task force's final report contained recommendations expressly leaving to each bargaining unit the final decision as to whether to withhold its services in a particular case. The task force itself exercises no authority unilaterally to implement its proposals since the Association's membership, its voting body, would have final approval as to any collective-bargaining matters within the scope of its study and thereafter the individual bargaining units of employee-nurses would decide what to do if the recommendations were accepted. The evidence shows that while none of the members of this task force was a supervisory or managerial employee of the Respondent some members were supervisory employees at other public or private hospitals or institutions.[37]

Another task force, "On Organizational Implication of the 1985 Proposal," a six-member group, included no supervisory or managerial employees of the Respondent.[38] This task force was an advisory body charged with studying whether the Association should extend membership privileges to licensed practical nurses who do not hold baccalaureate degrees. The task force recommended against so extending Association membership.

f. The Council on Economic and General Welfare

This is a seven-member Council which serves, pursuant to the Association's bylaws, in an advisory capacity to the Association's board of directors who appoint its members. The EGW Council also advises the EGWP staff. According to the uncontradicted testimony of Catheryne Welch, the Council does not implement the collective-bargaining program of the Association, does not participate in organizing or negotiating on behalf of the Association, and has no authority for the conduct of any collective-bargaining activity. While there is some dispute as to the supervisory or managerial status of two of the seven members of the EGW Council, it is admitted that supervisory or managerial employees can be appointed to membership on the Council by the Association's board of directors.

2. The American Nurses Association,[39] the New York State Nurses Association, and the Nurses Association of the Counties of Long Island, Inc., District 14[40]

The New York State Nurses Association (ANA) is a "constituent" of the American Nurses Association and District 14 a "constituent" of the New York State Nurses Association.[41] Welch testified that a "constituent organization" is one whose "constitution and bylaws are in harmony" with each other and, in the case of District 14's "constituency" with the New York State Nurses Association, has "been approved by a majority vote of the board of directors of this Association." Welch continued that the ANA, the Association, and District 14 are autonomous and separate nonprofit membership organizations, each having its own constitution and bylaws, its own membership, its own staff and programing, and its own dues requirements, with "constituent" status obtained on a voluntary basis.[42] However, the New York State Nurses Association collects its own membership dues as well as those of the American Nurses Association and the district nurses associations, where applicable, in one payment and then forwards the respective dues amounts to the appropriate nurses association. The reason therefor appears to be that the NYSNA has its own computerized payroll equipment which readily lends itself to this arrangement.[43] It is clear from the record that a part of the dues paid to the association is used to further the association's EGW program.

Welch in describing the interaction between the ANA and the NYSNA testified that,

> Periodically and from time to time the two organizations work collaboratively on issues which fall within their similar statements of purpose and functions, but each is a separate organization and functions in that fashion.

The Association has an "advisory council" composed of its "president" and the president or executive director of each of the 18 constituent districts and which meets quarterly "for the sharing of information, for reacting to ideas, to bring concerns from local areas." While the "advisory council" does not "make or implement policy" it "may suggest to the board [of directors] or recommends." Ruth Harper, District 14's executive director, testified that its representatives to the "advisory council" had never made a suggestion concerning the Association's EGWP at any of these meetings.

Concerning the "constituency" relationship between the Association and District 14, Harper testified that it,

> . . . really is that we are all bound by the same ethical concept, the same general purpose for which we exist and that we don't vary and that is to elevate the standards of the profession so we may render the best care to the public.[44]

[37] The evidence indicates that of 21 persons who have served as members of this task force at least 4 were or now are supervisory employees.

[38] The record does not establish whether any of the six members of this task force were supervisors or managers at other hospitals.

[39] The American Nurses Association is also referred to therein as ANA.

[40] The Nurses Association of the Counties of Long Island, Inc., District 14, is referred to hereinafter as District 14.

[41] NYSNA has 18 constituent districts throughout the State of New York. The Respondent's hospital is located within the geographical area encompassed by District 14.

[42] Welch testified that the Association "has no requirement to simultaneous or concurrent membership in any district association or the American Nurses Association." However, according to the testimony of Ruth Harper, the American Nurses Association does require "tri-level" membership, in the American Nurses Association, the New York or particular State Nurses Association, and the constituent district nurses association if applicable.

[43] Harper testified that the Association's collection of District 14 membership dues without charge to the District is one of the benefits it derives from its "constituency" status with the Association.

[44] Harper related that, while there is no direct relationship between District 14 and the American Nurses Association, District 14 does receive bulletins and newsletters about nursing or nursing practice from the

She stated that, while District 14 has its own bylaws, any proposed changes thereof are submitted to the Association for approval.[45] Harper added:

> In essence we conform with the general statements of the purpose for these associates and of all these levels and I think they are in harmony and the membership categories must be uniform . . . registered nurse duly licensed, eligible to practice.

Harper continued that District 14 programs, pursuant to its bylaws, include promoting nursing standards as defined by the ANA (educational programs concerning statements of nursing standards and practice), participating in and supporting the NYSNA's legislative program (but not including lobbying which District 14 is not equipped financially or personnel-wise to do), and encouragement and recruitment of qualified persons to enter the nursing field (maintaining a speakers' bureau which provides speakers to nursing schools, high schools, and private or public groups, and as part of this program District 14 prepares and issues a directory of nursing schools). Harper stated that District 14 also maintains and publishes a "nurses' professional registry" which is a placement service for private duty nurses under standards set by the Association.[46]

District 14 also prepares an annual survey of personnel practices and policies at the various hospitals in its geographical area and makes the survey available to individual nurses as well as to hospitals and other health care institutions within its jurisdiction. Harper testified that the purposes of the survey are: To collect "current accurate statistical data about nurses employment in our geographic area," to "assist nurses and others to improve their employment situations," and to "update the information presently in our files." She added that this survey is prepared with the "excellent cooperation of the hospital directors of nursing and also some of the larger nursing homes." Information concerning nurses' salaries at the various hospitals is also set forth in an issue of District 14's membership newsletter.

Harper testified that District 14 during the implementation of its programs disseminates information about both the ANA and the NYSNA for membership promotional purposes and supplies trilevel membership application forms when requested. Her testimony indicates that, while District 14 encourages membership in both ANA and NYSNA, its membership promotions are primarily directed towards its own District 14 membership.

According to Harper while it is one of the purposes of District 14 to improve the working conditions of nurses in the context of "improving nurses conditions of practice," District 14 does not function as a labor organization, does not engage in any collective-bargaining activities itself, nor does it have any input into the NYSNA's collective-bargaining activities. She stated that District 14 does not engage in "any specific activities that are solely limited to improving working conditions of its members."[47] Catheryne Welch testified similarly.

Additionally and concerning District 14 and the NYSNA, the record shows: that Catherine Foster, a supervisory nurse employed by the Respondent, was president of District 14 from May 1976 to May 1978 and during this time she also was chairman of the NYSNA's nominating committee in 1977; that various other members of District 14 held or now hold positions on other NYSNA's committees, i.e., Sister Mary Louise Murray is chairman of the NYSNA's nominating committee, Patricia Barry belongs to the NYSNA council on legislation, Dr. Margaret McClure serves on the NYSNA's Special Committee on the Nurse Practice Act, and Esther Channis is District 14's designee to the NYSNA's Education Planning Committee. The Respondent also offered evidence to show that James Vanderveld and Dr. Margaret McClure, members of District 14, attended the Association's 1977 convention during which the issue of the Association's no-strike policy was discussed and voted upon.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

In Sierra Vista Hospital, supra, the Board noted (241 NLRB at 623, 633):

> But, while the presence of supervisors in an association does not bear upon its "labor organization" status, the identity and role of those supervisors in the labor organization may operate, nonetheless, to disqualify it from bargaining in certain instances.[48] Central factors involved in considering this issue are the employees' right to a collective-bargaining representative whose undivided concern is for their interests and the employer's right to expect loyalty from its supervisors. Active participation by the employer's own supervisors may, in a given case, contravene either or both of these legitimate interests.[49] Indeed, we have held that an employer has a duty to refuse to bargain where the presence of that employer's supervisors on the opposite side of the bargaining table poses a conflict between those interests.[18]

ANA, competes for special project moneys from the ANA, and can participate in special programs such as "a creative nursing award." Harper added that District 14's relationship with ANA is "informational, historical, friendly, cooperative, we subscribe . . . in all ways with the code of ethics which is adopted on the national level."

[45] This does not include, however, changes concerning the amount of dues charged to its membership.

[46] The NYSNA maintains its own registry for private duty nurses, publishes standards of review of nursing registries, and supplies information on private duty nurse rates throughout the State, although District 14 sets its own fee rates for private duty nurses in its geographical area.

[47] Harper testified about one of District 14's organizational subgroups, "the nurse service administrators conference group," which held a meeting on October 4, 1977. Attending this meeting were representatives of the NYSNA (executive director, deputy director for programs, and the EGWP director), various area hospitals' directors of nursing and conference group, and District 14 members. The meeting was chaired by Harper and was convened to explore some of the aspects of the NYSNA's EGWP and the role of the directors of nursing in such a program.

[48] The Board in Sierra Vista Hospital, supra, explained:

> This potential for disqualification stems from an inherent statutory concern that "[e]mployees have the right to be represented in collective-bargaining negotiations by individuals whohave a single-minded loyalty to their interests,"[16] and the identity and role of supervisors admitted to membership in a labor organization can, in certain circumstances, compromise the statutory interest. Thus, active participation in the affairs of a labor organization by supervisors employed by the employer with whom that labor organization seeks to bargain can give rise to question about the labor organization's ability to deal with the employer at arm's length. > ests.[49] Indeed, we have held that an employer has a duty to refuse to bargain where the presence of that employer's supervisors on the opposite side of the bargaining table poses a conflict between those interests.[18]
> The active, internal union participation of supervisors of a third-party employer (i.e., an employer other than the one with whom the labor organization seeks to bargain) does not present the danger that an employer may be "bargaining with itself." But it may operate, nonetheless, to disqualify a labor organization from acting as a bargaining representative for particular employees. Although, in such cases, the legitimate interest of an employer in the loyalty of its supervisors is not in issue (the active supervisors are not its own), the presence of supervisors of third-party employers may impinge upon the employees' right to a bargaining representative whose undivided concern is for their interests . . . because of the possible relation between the employer with whom bargaining is sought and the employer or employers of the supervisor participating in the bargaining process. Thus, we have held that an employer may lawfully refuse to bargain with a bargaining representative which itself was in a competing business.[20]

While recognizing that an employer who establishes a disqualifying conflict of interest may lawfully refuse to bargain, the Board in Sierra Vista Hospital, supra, also held that "the burden on the employer to show such conflict is a heavy one." The Board stated:

> There is a strong public policy favoring the free choice of a bargaining agent by employees. The choice is not lightly to the frustrated. There is a considerable burden on a nonconsenting employer, in such a situation as this, to come forward with a showing that danger of a conflict of interest interfering with the collective bargaining process is clear and present.[22]

> [22] N.L.R.B. v. David Buttrick Company, 399 F.2d 505, 507 (1st Cir. 1968). There can be no question with regard to a conflict-of-interest defense that the Board agrees with the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit's formulation of a respondent's burden of showing a "clear and present danger" and that the Board will strike that defense when a respondent fails to carry its burden.

The Respondent contends that the New York State Nurses Association should be disqualified from acting as the collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's licensed professional nurses in an appropriate unit because of a conflict of interest due to the Association's being "influenced, directed, dominated and/or controlled by persons who occupy supervisory and/or management positions" within the Respondent's own hospital or in other hospitals or health care institutions. I do not credit this contention. The Respondent has clearly failed to sustain its "considerable burden . . . in such a situation as this, to come forward with a showing that danger of a conflict of interest interfering with the collective bargaining process is clear and present."[51]

Initially, it is clear from the record in this case that no supervisory or managerial employee of the Respondent has ever been an official or director of the NYSNA. Further, while it is true that statutory supervisors employed by third-party employers have been and are now members of the Association's board of directors the evidence herein shows that, as a practical matter, the board of directors has no input into the NYSNA's collective-bargaining process. Bargaining unit decisions are not brought to the board of directors' attention for review or action and Welch testified uncontradictedly that she knew of no instance when the board of directors had considered or actually vetoed or overridden any bargaining unit decision.

The uncontradicted evidence herein further shows that the "Councils of Nursing Practitioners," the bargaining units of nurses at the various hospitals and other health care facilities, control the bargaining process. The bargaining unit adopts its own rules for conducting bargaining unit business and elects a negotiating committee from among unit members. It should be particularly noted that these bargaining units are composed of licensed professional staff nurses excluding all statutory nurse supervisors and managers. The Association does not advise the unit concerning the composition of the negotiating committee, and does not have a vote in establishing the committee.[52] Proposals for bargaining are generated by the unit itself and are not submitted to the Association for approval. The Association's labor relations representatives, who generally act as chief negotiators on behalf of the individual bargaining units, are paid staff employees of the Association and are not supervisors or managerial employees of any hospital, including the Respondent's. However, as the evidence indicates, at times the bargaining unit will elect to have a member of the negotiating committee present a particular contract proposal to the employer at the bargaining session. Members of the bargaining unit retain authority to authorize the negotiation of all proposals and to accept or reject proposed modifications of unit proposals. When negotiations are completed, acceptance or rejection of the proposed agreement lies solely with the bargaining unit.

> We emphasize that we are here concerned with supervisors who have an active role in and some authority with respect to directing the affairs of a labor organization. Cf. International Organization of Masters, Mates and Pilots, supra; Allen B. Dumont Laboratories, Inc., 88 NLRB 1296 (1950).

[50] The Board continued:

> Under the foregoing analysis, it is conceivable that the presence of even one supervisor on CNA's [California Nurses Association] board of directors, if employed by Respondent, could present a danger that unit employees' interests might not be single-mindedly represented. That would depend on the role, if any, of that supervisor in CNA's internal affairs. It is also conceivable that the active involvement in CNA of supervisory nurses employed by other employers may, in some circumstances, present a conflict of interest requiring that CNA be disqualified from representing a particular unit for which it was certified. That would depend on a demonstrated connection between the employer of those unit employees and the employer or employers of those supervisors, and, with respect to this possibility, we stress that the participation of supervisors (of third-party employers), even if constituting a majority of a nurses' association's board of directors, would not in and of itself necessarily require disqualification, absent some other demonstrated conflict of interest, for we do not assume an "inherent" conflict between supervisors and employees in the bargaining process. [Sierra Vista Hospital, Inc., supra at 633 (emphasis supplied).]

[51] Sierra Vista Hospital, Inc., supra.

[52] At the Respondent's hospital the bargaining unit nurses elected their own negotiating committee consisting exclusively of members of the bargaining unit.

Additionally, the evidence clearly shows that the Association's role in the bargaining process is purely advisory and, to the extent that the Association's staff are involved in bargaining, no supervisory or managerial personnel affect the process. The Association's staff[53] who advise the unit regarding organizational aspects and bargaining are full-time employees of the Association and are not employed elsewhere. The executive director of the Association, who generally executes the collective-bargaining agreements on behalf of the Association, is also a full-time Association employee and is not a supervisor or manager of any hospital or health care related institution. Moreover, her authority with respect to collective bargaining is purely ministerial, as she does not have the authority to reject a collective-bargaining agreement submitted for execution.

Significantly, the Board has rejected employer's conflict-of-interest contentions in a number of cases in which bargaining units retain similar control over the collective-bargaining process as do the Association's bargaining units.[54]

As to the Respondent's own supervisory and managerial employees, the Respondent alleges that because Catherine Foster, a supervisor at its hospital, was "President of District 14, which compiles wage and area practice surveys, sets private duty nurse fees and otherwise assists in [NYSNA] EGW activities, and Chairman of the [NYSNA] Nominating Committee . . . these relationships forced an intolerable compromise of loyalties that is precisely the kind of conflict of interest both the Board and the Courts have condemned." I do not agree.

The evidence herein clearly shows that District 14 is not a labor organization, does not engage in collective bargaining itself, and does not influence the collective-bargaining process or programs of the NYSNA. The Board has expressly rejected employer's conflict of interest contentions based upon the activities of the employer's own alleged supervisors in constituent districts of state nurses' associations.[55]

Moreover, the mere fact that supervisory or managerial employees of the Respondent hold membership in the Association, attend voting sessions of the Association's conventions, or vote by secret ballot where provided for concerning Association policy and functioning in and of itself does not present the "clear and present danger" of conflict with employees' Section 7 bargaining rights envisioned by the Board's Decision in Sierra Vista, supra.[56]

The Respondent also argues that the Association is disqualified from bargaining as the representative of the appropriate nurses' bargaining unit because of the activities of supervisors or managers of other employers. The Respondent states that, at least from 1976 through 1978, a majority of the members of the Association's board of directors have been "statutory supervisors employed at hospitals and other health care institutions" and since, in addition, "important [Association] policy formation committees are laden with statutory supervisors" including the "Special Committee to Consider Concerns of Directors of Nursing Practice and Services," the "Task Force on Inpediments to Quality Nursing Care," and the NYSNA nominating committee, supervisors at all levels are thus involved "without restriction" in every important phase of the Association's operations, "including financial matters, the life blood of EGW and policy making directly affecting EGWP."

As indicated hereinbefore the Board in Sierra Vista Hospital, Inc., supra, stated:

> [W]e stress that the participation of supervisors (of third-party employers), even if constituting a majority of a nurses' association's board of directors, would not in and of itself necessarily require disqualification, absent some other demonstrated conflict of interest, for we do not assume an "inherent" conflict between supervisors and employees in the bargaining process.

Thus, it is clear that the employer must show some connection between the employer of those unit employees and the employer or employers of those supervisors.[57] It is also clear that it is insufficient to establish disqualification of the Association herein to bargain simply because one, a few, or even a majority of its board of directors are supervisors or managers of some other hospital or to suppose some conflict when in fact none exists or has ever occurred before. The record in this case is devoid of any evidence showing that any member of the Association's board of directors has ever interfered with, dominated, or controlled any of the Association's collective-bargaining activities. Further, the Respondent failed to show any evidence that a "supervisory" member of the

[55] In Baptist Hospitals, Inc., supra at 171, the Board stated:

> While there are some supervisors of the Employer and of Lourdes Hospital who serve as officers and directors of [Kentucky Nurses Association]'s District 5, the record indicates that there is nothing in KNA's organizational structure which allows for district officers and directors to interfere with the collective-bargaining process of a local unit.

Association's board of directors employed at another hospital "has used or could use his or her position to influence that board to advance the competitive position of any hospital as against the Employer."[58]

Significantly, the Board has repeatedly rejected an employer's assertions of disqualifying conflicts of interests where "third-party" supervisors were or had been members of a nurses' association's board of directors absent a showing by an employer of proof of a connection between the hospital and the employers of such supervisors sufficient to evidence a conflict of interest that would compromise the integrity of the bargaining process.[59] In the instant matter the Respondent has failed to show either that its own supervisors serve on the Association's board of directors, or that there exists a connection between the Respondent's hospital and the employers of the supervisors who are now or have served previously on the Association's board of directors which could compromise bargaining.

Furthermore, in considering the Respondent's other contentions it should be noted that the Board in The Sidney Farber Cancer Institute, supra, stated:

> As to the Employer's assertions that the MNA board of directors' various powers, such as those of appointment, approval, and fiscal control, amount to supervisory domination, we find these functions of organizational oversight to be both remote end speculative in relation to the local chapters' bargaining activities. Something more than mere potential for influence must be shown to warrant disqualifying a labor organization. [247 NLRB at 4.]

Thus the Board has expressly rejected the Respondent's argument that the "power of the purse" as represented in the Association's board of directors' authority to adopt, approve, or modify the Association's annual operating budget creates a potential for interference with collective bargaining which requires disqualification of the Association.

The Respondent also points to the presence of supervisory or managerial employees of other hospitals or health care related institutions on the Association's "Special Committee to Consider Concerns of Directors of Nursing Practice and Services" as creating a clear and present danger of conflict with employee rights. This committee recommended, in substance, that the Association allow the continued full participation of the directors of nursing practice and services in the Association, provide legal and employment assistance to directors of nursing practice and services, and challenge and publicize any discriminatory action by employers against these directors of nursing and services because of their Association membership.

In Healdsburg General Hospital, supra, a case involving somewhat similar circumstances, the Board rejected the employer's contention that because the California Nurses Association (CNA) maintained a division devoted to the interests of supervisors (advising supervisory nurses of their rights and responsibilities as members of management and concerning their own contract negotiations with their hospital employers, and representing them in their employment relations with the hospitals, all at high cost) it is "influenced, dominated and controlled" by member supervisors. The employer therein asserted that the diversion of sorely needed funds from bargaining unit employees' needs to the promotion of supervisors' interests presents a "classic conflict of interest for, if CNA has allegiance to supervisors, that allegiance compromises its representation of bargaining unit employees at the bargaining table." The employer further asserted that supervisors, because they are represented by CNA and their interests are protected by CNA, owe allegiance to CNA as well as to their employer and that such a relationship, inevitably, has an adverse impact on management.

The Board stated in the Healdsburg General Hospital case:

> [T]he Employer claims that, because CNA is influenced by supervisors, it cannot give its undivided loyalty to the interests of employees. In this the Employer alleges that CNA is, in fact, influenced by supervisors; that CNA represents "all" nurses including supervisors; and that such representation is costly and controversial. Even assuming that to be the case, the Employer failed to establish that any of these factors creates a conflict of interest sufficient to prevent CNA from acting as bargaining representative. As emphasized, the Board in Sierra Vista stated that "there is no inherent conflict between supervisors and employees in the bargaining process." The Employer apparently takes the position that there is and offers the above evidence as proof. However, it is clear that the internal structure and problems of CNA, as presented by the Employer, are irrelevant to our inquiry absent some showing of a particular conflict. None has been shown by the Employer either in its offer of proof or in its brief. [247 NLRB at 214.]

Thus it is not enough for an employer to show that supervisors participate or even "influence" the Association. The respondent must show a "direct" conflict of interest, "that a danger of a conflict of interest interfering with the collective bargaining process is clear and present."[60] A nurses association's interest in supervisory nurses' problems does not evidence a "clear and present" danger of conflict of interest to disqualify it from representing rank-and-file nurses.

Additionally, as stated by the Board, in The Sidney Farber Cancer Institute, supra at 4:

> We likewise find the Employer's assertion that its supervisors may hold office or positions of authority in MNA at some future time entirely too speculative to warrant disqualification of MNA. Nor is that > assertion probative of establishing the existence of a clear and present danger of conflict.[61]

In support of its contentions the Respondent introduced evidence that the NYSNA submits the names of nominees to the New York State Education Department for appointment to that State's board of nursing. The Board in St. Rose de Lima Hospital, Inc., supra, involving a similar allegation concerning the Nevada Nurses Association's authority to nominate registered nurses for appointment to the Nevada State Board of Nursing, found "this contention entirely too speculative and, hence, lacking in merit."

Based upon all of the foregoing, I find that the New York State Nurses Association is not disqualified because of an alleged conflict of interest from representing the Respondent's employees in an appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining. The Respondent has failed to sustain its burden of showing that danger of a conflict of interest interfering with the collective-bargaining process is clear and present.[62]

D. The Request To Bargain and the Respondent's Refusal

As noted hereinbefore, the Board certificated the Association as the collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's licensed professional nurses in an appropriate unit on February 21, 1978. On or about April 18, 1978, the Association requested the Respondent to bargain collectively with it as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the unit. Commencing on or about April 21, 1978, and continuing at all times thereafter to date, the Respondent has refused, and continues to refuse, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative for collective bargaining of all employees in the unit. As found above the Association is not disqualified because of any conflict of interest from acting as such certified bargaining representative.

Accordingly, I find that the Respondent has, since April 21, 1978, and at all times thereafter, refused to bargain collectively with the Association as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, and that, by such refusal, the Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

V. CASE 29-RC-3989

Subsequent to the Board's certification of the Association, on February 21, 1978, as the bargaining representative of all the Respondent's licensed professional nurses in an appropriate unit in Case 29-RC-3989, the Respondent on July 17, 1978, filed a motion to revoke certification alleging inter alia that the Association is influenced, dominated, and controlled by supervisors and/or managers who serve as both officers and directors of the Association and therefore the Association is not a bona fide labor organization and is disqualified from acting as a bargaining representative. From all of the foregoing I deny the Respondent's motion to revoke certification in Case 29-RC-3989.

VI. THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom, and, upon request, bargain collectively with the Association as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit, and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

In order to insure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, the initial period of certification shall be construed as beginning on the date the Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Association as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit.[63]

Additional Remedies Sought by the Association

The Association seeks additional remedial relief herein because "The Hospitals 'Domination' Defense was Plainly Frivolous." As noted hereinbefore the Association seeks the following additional remedies: (1) expenses incurred in the investigation, preparation, presentation, and conduct of these cases, including reasonable counsel fees, witness fees, transcript and record costs, travel expenses and per diem, and other reasonable costs and expenses; (2) the hospital should be ordered to mail copies of the "Notice to Employees" to each of the employees in the bargaining unit at his or her home; (3) the hospital's personnel administrator should be ordered personally to read the "Notice to Employees" to the members of the bargaining unit at the hospital, in the presence of representatives of the Association and the Board; (4) the Association should be granted access to the hospital's bulletin boards and premises during the entire period of contract negotiations; (5) all terms of any contract agreed to in collective bargaining, including but not limited to wages and benefits, should be made retroactive to the date of the election; and (6) the hospital should be ordered to reimburse the Association for lost dues and initiation fees since the election and to reimburse employee-members who have paid such dues and initiation fees to the Association while the hospital was engaged in its unlawful refusal to bargain.

The Board in Tiidee Products, Inc., 194 NLRB 1234 (1972), held that where a respondent engaged in frivolous litigation that is clearly unwarranted and meritless on its face, it should be compelled to reimburse the Board and the charging party for all expenses incurred in the investigaton, preparation, and presentation of the case.[64] The Board's purpose therefore was to discourage frivolous litigation and to "prevent the employer from having a free ride during the period of litigation."[65] This remedy has also been imposed where an employer follows a pattern of unlawfully resisting union organizing or engages in "flagrant repetition of conduct previously found unlawful" and to that end unduly burdens the processes of the Board and the courts.[66]

However, in examining the propriety of awarding litigation and organizational expenses against a respondent, the Board has distinguished between "patently frivolous" defenses[67] to unfair labor practice charges and defenses which are "debatable." In the latter situation the Board has held that reimbursement of litigation and organizational expenses is inappropriate, even when the unfair labor practices are flagrant and repetitious.[68] Also the Board has consistently followed its rule that litigation and organizational expenses are not to be awarded against a respondent unless the defenses raised are patently frivolous.[69] An additional prerequisite to the awarding of organizational costs was set forth in Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., 224 NLRB 1418 (1976). The Board there held that it will not award organizational costs to a union unless the union proves that the employer's unfair labor practices were causally related to any extraordinary organizational expenses incurred by the union.

In view of the above, and the record herein as a whole, I do not find that the Respondent's actions nor its defenses were so "patently frivolous" as to warrant the additional and extraordinary remedies sought by the Association herein and therefore deny the Association's motions and applications for such relief. I also deny as unnecessary the Association's request to reopen the record "to receive evidence of Hospital unfair labor practices and election interference which were excluded at the hearing but directly revealed the hospital's improper motive throughout this proceeding."[70] Even assuming that the evidence to be produced would prove what the Association alleges it would show in its offer of proof, I do not believe that this would warrant the imposition of the above remedies nor change my findings thereon.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. North Shore University Hospital is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. New York State Nurses Association is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All full-time and regular part-time registered professional nurses regularly scheduled to work 22-1/2 hours or more per week, including all those authorized by permit to practice as registered nurses, employed by the employer at 300 Community Drive, Manhasset, New York; excluding all department heads, administrative directors, directors, associate directors, assistant directors, all supervisors, clinical supervisors, all clinicians, all instructors, all specialists, operating rooms nurse specialists, all coordinators, head nurses, assistant head nurses, all casual employees, temporary employees, confidential employees, managerial employees, all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since February 21, 1978, the above-named labor organization has been and now is the certified and exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing on or about April 21, 1978, and at all times thereafter, to bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees of the Respondent in the appropriate unit, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. By the aforesaid refusal to bargain, the Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing, employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. The unfair labor practices found above are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Upon the basis of the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and upon the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

Stop and Shop Companies, Inc. Medi Mart Division and Richard Goodusky. Case 39-CA-337[1]

December 29, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On September 3, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Joel P. Biblowitz issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel and the Union[2] filed exceptions and a supporting brief,[3] and the Respondent filed a brief in answer to the General Counsel's and the Union's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

---

[1] The Administrative Law Judge erroneously cited this case as 1-CA-16673, which was its designation prior to the matter being transferred to the Board's recently established Subregion 39.

[2] The Union herein, Local 100, United Pharmacists Guild, chartered by United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, was the collective-bargaining representative for the Charging Party, Richard Goodusky, but was not a party to the instant proceeding.

[3] The Respondent also filed cross-exceptions to certain findings made by the Administrative Law Judge which it contends the Board should consider if any merit is found to either the General Counsel's or the Union's exceptions. In view of our findings herein, we deem it unnecessary to consider Respondent's cross-exceptions.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOEL P. BIBLOWITZ, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me in Hartford, Connecticut, on April 21, 1981. A complaint and notice of hearing issued on September 17, 1980, based on a charge filed on October 11, 1979, by Richard Goodusky, an individual. Basically, the complaint alleges that Stop and Shop Companies, Inc., Medi Mart Division, herein called Respondent, violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act by informing Goodusky in September 1979[1] that his employment with Respondent was in jeopardy because of his prior union activities and a prior charge filed on his behalf with the National Labor Relations Board, and by discharging Goodusky on September 24 for his union activities and for his having filed charges or given testimony under the National Labor Relations Act.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a Massachusetts corporation with its principal office and place of business located at 1776 Heritage Drive, Quincy, Massachusetts, and with a place of business located at 1200 Park Street, Hartford, Connecticut, herein called the Park Street store, is engaged in the operation of a retail chain of supermarkets, drug stores, and other retail establishments in several States. In the course and conduct of its business operations Respondent's gross revenue exceeded $500,000 and, in the conduct of its business operations it annually purchased, transferred, and delivered to its Park Street store goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which were transported to said store from States other than the State of Massachusetts. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that Local 100, United Pharmacists Guild, chartered by United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, herein called the Union is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE FACTS

Pre-September 24, 1979, Events

Goodusky began working in Respondent's Park Street store in or about 1971 as a pharmacist. There are generally two pharmacists at that store; for almost the same period the other pharmacist has been Roger Blais, whose title is pharmacy manager; they work split shifts, one working early hours and the other late hours. Sometime in 1975 the Union began an organization drive among the 25 pharmacists at 16 of Respondent's stores—10 in Connecticut (including the Park Street store) and 6 in New Jersey. Goodusky testified that during this period he spoke to many of Respondent's pharmacists to convince them to vote in favor of the Union (at his or their homes, but not in the stores), but that there were no union buttons to wear, he never told anyone from management that he was attempting to unionize Respondent's stores and nobody from management ever informed him that they knew he was organizing for the Union, although he "assumed" that it was common knowledge. Although Goodusky did not personally give union cards to any other pharmacist, he was present at the meetings where this occurred. There were other pharmacists who were at least as active, if not more active, than he in getting the Union into Respondent's stores. As to his activities on behalf of the Union during that period, Goodusky testified:

> I contacted people constantly when there was talk about whether we would vote pro or con, I tried to sway as many of the con votes into pros as I could. At the meetings we discussed why we were going to vote this way, why a person who wasn't say, going to vote for the union, should vote for the union. I saw to it that those were going to be too busy to attend the meeting, possibly weren't to busy, so we always had excellent attendance from the north.

Respondent's witnesses denied any knowledge of Goodusky's union activities during this period, or any period.

The Union was certified on December 19, 1975. The first collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Union was effective July 3, 1977, through July 5, 1980, the next collective-bargaining agreement between the parties was effective July 6, 1980, through July 2, 1983.

Goodusky was discharged by Respondent on November 30, 1976. He was informed by Respondent that the reason for the discharge was prescription errors he made. In one of these errors he issued a prescription for 50 milligrams of a drug, when the prescription called for 25 milligrams of the drug, and in the other incident the prescription called for a specific drug and he dispensed the drug generically instead (Goodusky testified that the prescription was scribbled and he misread it). In addition, there was testimony regarding another alleged prescription error involving prescribing Premarin instead of Aldomet. Goodusky testified that after his discharge it was discovered that he had not made this error, but that the clerk had given the wrong bag to the customer. The Union filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board, a complaint issued on this charge including, inter alia, the allegation that Goodusky was discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. He was reinstated by Respondent in March 1977 and in June 1977 the charge was withdrawn by the Union pursuant to a non-Board settlement where Goodusky accepted partial backpay for the period where he was absent from his employment.

Between that time and September 1979 there were several events that the General Counsel alleges establish the animus of Respondent toward Goodusky. He testified that his first paycheck upon returning was in the amount of $31 instead of the usual amount of approximately $550; this was because Respondent had used a wage rate that had been in effect 3 years earlier, it had made deductions for his medical insurance program for the entire period that he was out, although he testified that he did not have the coverage during the period, and it deducted union dues for the entire year and the union initiation fee[2] which Goodusky testified: ". . . is normally taken out of new employees." Goodusky phoned Respondent about this situation and he later received the proper amount. Goodusky also testified that on one of his first days after being reinstated, there was a roof leak at the Park Street store; when he arrived for work other employees were mopping the leaking water and Goodusky began moving boxes that were getting wet. The then store manager, Macielewicz, told one of the employees who was mopping the water that he should get back to his regular job and not bother himself with mopping, and told the other employees who were mopping that he should make him (Macielewicz) coffee. This left only Goodusky mopping in the pharmacy and he testified that Macielewicz made a joke about it, that it could not have happened to a better guy. Goodusky testified that in January 1979 he was given another employee handbook (which he was asked to sign for) even though he had been employed by Respondent for 9 years and had originally received one. Additionally, Goodusky, during the period between mid-1977 and September 1979 was issued a reprimand. He testified that he caught a cold and had a fever and called the store and said he would not be in because he was ill. When he later arrived for work "the store manager said in my particular case, should I ever get sick again, he would require 2 days' notice and that he was writing me up for failing to give such notice."

Sometime subsequent to June 1977, Goodusky was called to a meeting with Daniel Corcoran, Respondent's personnel director, and Clayton, of Respondent's labor relations department. They spoke with him about customer complaints regarding him in June 1977. They informed him that they expected everybody employed by Respondent to perform to the same standards, and they wished to set the record straight and that everyone would go forward from that point and there would be no more difficulties; no action was taken on the June 1977 customer complaints by Respondent.

In January 1979, a customer with a screaming child asked the clerk to prepare her prescription immediately because it was an emergency. When the clerk informed Goodusky of this, he told the clerk, "every case is an emergency." The customer overheard this remark and complained to Respondent about it. Additionally, during this period Respondent complained to Goodusky that he had not timely filled a prescription for one of its employees.

Goodusky testified that during the period between his reinstatement and September 24 he was involved in some activities in support of the Union. During this period he was on the Union's organizing committee which was attempting to organize some of the small pharmacy chains in the area; he was one of four of Respondent's pharmacists who were on the committee. In addition, he assisted the Union in contacting the members for the twice-a-year union meeting for Respondent's employees; on most of these occasions he would have supper for the members who met at his house; from there, they would drive together to the union meeting.

Sometime during the summer of 1979, Goodusky had a conversation with Blais (who was also a member of the Union). Blais informed him that because of their seniority Respondent would have a difficult time with both of them in the same store; with 4 weeks' vacation for each plus personal days, one of them would be away for 3 months out of the year. Because of this, Blais informed him that he thought one of them would have to go, one way or another. Goodusky then spoke to Fred Frazao, assistant store manager for the Park Street Store, and an admitted supervisor. Goodusky repeated Blais, conversation to him and asked him if it were correct. Goodusky testified that Frazao said it would be difficult having two men with 10 years' seniority in the same store, ". . . there's just no way that they're going to tolerate it, no way they can pull it off" and that he was thinking in terms of a transfer.[3] They spoke some more of the situation and, according to Goodusky's testimony, Frazao said that it was common knowledge that Goodusky was on the "shit list." Frazao testified that during this period Goodusky approached him and informed him of the above-mentioned conversation with Blais and asked how the store could handle the situation. He told Goodusky that the worst that could happen is that one of them would be transferred. Frazao also testified that about that time Goodusky asked him if he knew about his prior discharge[4] and Frazao indicated that he did not even know that Goodusky had previously been discharged. Goodusky then informed him of the previous discharge and that it was a setup. In answer to a question as to whether he made any comments to Goodusky as to how he was viewed by Respondent, Frazao testified: "I did, at one point, believe I said that the Company doesn't regard you very highly." As to what this statement was based on, Frazao testified that this was based mainly on conversations with Goodusky and "his paranoia and everything else."

[2] The issue of the union dues and initiation fee is unclear in the record. For one thing it is unclear whether he had previously paid the initiation fee. Additionally the parties stipulated that the initial contract was effective July 3, 1977, shortly after Goodusky's reinstatement. Why then any dues obligation or initiation fee at an earlier time?

September 24, 1979, and Beyond

On September 24, Goodusky was scheduled to work from 2 to 10. On that day he appeared at work at 1:30 because he knew there was a problem with a prescription which he would try to resolve on his own time. He testified that the problem was as follows:

> I received a phone call that Sunday, the day before, from a doctor around five o'clock who told me that he had come across two bottles that had the labels swapped around and he said the patient was readmitted to the hospital because he wasn't responding properly and the doctor happened to notice that I had the labels on—switched containers. I explained to the doctor, you know, what the—doctor made an error in writing the prescription, in which he wrote—he indicated he wanted a liquid, but then in the instructions he said, "take one teaspoonful of the tablets," which it was ambiguous, you couldn't tell whether he wanted the liquid, well, anyways, so, I explained this to the doctors, I says, "doctor, you goofed on the prescription," and I explained it to him, you know, in order to save, you know, face, you might say, so at this point I asked the doctor, I says, "could I have the name and the address of the patient" because we should fill out an accident—we have to fill out an accident report, and the doctor told me "there's no problem," he says, "forget the whole thing," I said, well, can I at least have the prescription number so I can, you know, he says, "look, forget about the whole thing," once he discovered he had made the initial error, and he explained to me that he just happened to notice this when the patient was readmitted, there was absolutely no indication—He said there was no indication that the medicine was used incorrectly.

After he worked for approximately 15 minutes, Blais told him that he should speak to Milton Andrews, the manager of the Park Street store. Goodusky went upstairs to Andrews' office. (At or about 10:30 that morning Andrews had called the Park Street store and learned from Frazao of the prescription error described above. Frazao informed Andrews that a prescription error report had been prepared (by Blais) regarding the incident and Andrews said that he would review it when he arrived at work.) Goodusky entered Andrews' office and sat across the desk from Andrews; Andrews informed him of the prescription error report and Goodusky explained how it happened; Andrews then asked him what was on his breath that smelled like alcohol, whether he had a drink before coming to work. At first he denied having a drink before work, telling Andrews that it was Lavoris mouthwash that he smelled. Andrews replied that he used Lavoris, but that it did not smell like that. Goodusky then admitted to Andrews that he had a martini at lunch with his wife and that it was common knowledge that he has a drink with lunch. Andrews then told Goodusky to go back downstairs to work, which he did.

Andrews then called Daniel Corcoran, vice president of personnel for Respondent, and informed him of the prescription error involving Goodusky and that during a discussion with him about it he smelled liquor on Goodusky's breath. Corcoran informed Andrews that he wanted to discuss the issue with others in the office and he would call him back. A few moments later he called Andrews back and told him to ask Blais if he could also smell liquor on Goodusky's breath or observe any other movement or anything relating to alcohol. Andrews then asked Blais if he could smell alcohol on Goodusky's breath and Blais said that he could not. Corcoran testified that he then called Andrews back and said that he had discussed the issue with other of Respondent's personnel officials and they decided that Goodusky should be suspended, pending termination, for being under the influence.[5] Andrews however testified: "I was told by Mr. Corcoran to discharge him," and that the only reason given was: "For being under the influence." Goodusky was then called up to Andrews' office. Frazao was also present. Andrews showed Goodusky the prescription error report, discussed supra, and asked him to sign it. He began to read it and informed Andrews that he objected to item 11 in the report which states, "Did the prescription error result in a hospitalization or require medical attention?" With the answer: "Yes." Goodusky told Andrews that nobody had said anything about the patient being hospitalized because of his error, so Andrews crossed out "yes" and inserted "Info to follow."[6] Goodusky then signed the report and Andrews told him he was fired for being under the influence of alcohol. Andrews then gave Goodusky Respondent's "Report of Change Form (Form 191)" which states: "effective 9/24/79 termination for working under the influence of alcohol." Andrews asked him to sign this form and he refused. Andrews informed him that his theory was that if you have a drink the alcohol will be in your stomach and bloodstream and everything you do will be under its influence. Goodusky refused to sign, and left.

[3] Goodusky testified that it was Blais, not Frazao, who was in charge of scheduling pharmacists.

[4] Frazao was not employed by Respondent at the time of Goodusky's discharge in 1976.

[5] During this conversation Andrews informed Corcoran that Blais said that he could not smell liquor on Goodusky's breath.

Corcoran then contacted Richard Moed, then Respondent's market manager for Connecticut, and informed him to contact Charles Bowen, the union president, and inform him of the situation involving Goodusky. The parties (including, inter alia, Goodusky, Corcoran, Andrews, Frazao, Blais, and Bowen) met at the "third step" meeting (the parties never had a "second step" meeting because Moed and Bowen had difficulty setting up such a meeting) on November 8. At this meeting all the parties had an opportunity to, and did, present their side of the story. Respondent, in the course of these discussions, discussed inter alia, Goodusky's prescription errors, and Goodusky likewise recited the events comprising the prescription error and the events of September 24. At the end of this meeting Respondent's representatives informed the Union's representatives that they would get back to them when they reached a decision regarding Goodusky. After the meeting Corcoran met with Clayton, Respondent's then director of labor relations. They decided that "Goodusky would be terminated and then the next move would be up to the Union." In arriving at that decision they considered Goodusky's being under the influence on September 24, the prescription error and the similarity to prescription errors he had previously made. Bowen was informed of the decision and the matter was taken to arbitration.

Andrews testified that he had not previously issued Goodusky a warning about having a drink before reporting to work and, to his knowledge, nobody else at Respondent had issued him such a warning. Andrews had never previously discharged any employee for reporting to work with the smell of alcohol on his breath.[7] Corcoran testified that while Respondent had prior situations involving prescription errors, this was the first incident of a pharmacist being under the influence of alcohol. Blais testified that on September 24 he did not smell alcohol on Goodusky's breath although on three or four occasions over the previous 4 or 5 years he did smell alcohol on Goodusky's breath and on those occasions he told him to be more careful because he considered it objectionable when dealing with customers and patients.

As regards the prescription error involved herein, the physician's prescription was unclear as to whether it was for a liquid (it called for tablets yet provided for a liquid dose—one teaspoonful). Goodusky called the doctor twice, but each time was put on hold and hung up before speaking to the doctor, and filled the prescription based on his own judgment. In addition, after filling the prescription with a liquid dose, he misplaced the labels, thus directing the patient to put the medication in his eyes, when it was intended to be taken orally, and vice versa. In addition to the testimony of Blais that the father of the child for whom the prescriptions were intended informed him that he had been hospitalized, Corcoran testified that sometime between September and November he was informed by Respondent's insurance carrier that the child had been hospitalized. The error was settled between Respondent and the customer by the payment to the customer of $200.

As regards actions taken against pharmacists and prescription errors, the parties stipulated to the following for the period January 1, 1978, to the date of the hearing.

1. Other than Goodusky, no other pharmacist was discharged by Respondent.

2. There have been five suspensions to pharmacist, including two to pharmacist Hausman.

3. There were 21 other form 191's representing oral warnings or reprimands. Six were issued to pharmacist Hausman.

4. In addition to the 12 prescription error reports in General Counsel's Exhibit 4, there were 11 additional reports. Of these 11, 2 involved hospitalization and 1 of these involved a 1-day suspension of the pharmacist. None of these 11 prescription errors resulted from substitution by a pharmacist for an unfillable prescription.[8]

As stated, supra, Respondent's handbook warns against "drinking or being under the influence of liquor on the job." Andrews' understanding of this rule is that if the employee had a drink, and he had the drink at a close enough time that he could smell it on his breath, he is under the influence of liquor. As regards Goodusky's condition that day, Andrews testified that he did not know if Goodusky was staggering, that his speech was not noticeably slurred, and that there was no indication that he was intoxicated. Blais testified that on that day Goodusky was not intoxicated and, although he did not smell liquor on his breath that day, he did on three or four occasions over the past 4 or 5 years, but on none of these occasions was Goodusky intoxicated.

Prior to September 24, Goodusky had never been warned by Respondent about having a drink before reporting to work, nor had he ever been warned about being intoxicated on the job. He testified that in or about

[6] Goodusky never objected to item 9 in this report, which asks for the details of the error. The answer, prepared by Blais stated: "Labels swapped—father claims child was admitted to hospital 9/23/79."

[7] The employees' manual, given to Respondent's enployees is a six-page pamphlet. The last page states, inter alia: "the following inconsiderate actions are some of those which can affect a person's growth in the Company, and will result in disciplinary actions—even dismissal." Twenty-four actions are then listed, the seventh of which is: "Drinking or being under the influence of liquor on the job."

[8] Of the 12 prescription errors reports that comprise G.C. Exh. 4, only one pharmacist, Gary Zemek, who is named twice, is cited more than once for a prescription error.

1976 he had a conversation with Blais and Moed, then Respondent's district manager, who told him that if he must have his noontime drink, he should switch from gin to vodka because it has no odor to it. Blais testified that in a conversation at that time, Moed said that he had stopped having a drink at lunch because of the impression it gave; he also told them to use vodka instead of gin with mixed drinks so that there would be no odor. Moed testified that about that time he did have a conversation with Goodusky about drinking. It had come to his knowledge that Goodusky was drinking prior to coming to work and he told him: "you know, we don't do it, its against company policy." He denies suggesting that Goodusky switch from gin to vodka to avoid the odor.

Corcoran testified that, "Under the influence would mean to me would be that where you could smell alcohol on an individual's breath, their actions are impaired in some way or that they are making an impression to a customer that they're under the influence, when it affects the individual's work." Corcoran testified that this rule was not spelled out more specifically because this incident with Goodusky was the first incident where the question arose.

A day or two after the discharge Goodusky called Frazao at the store sometime after 10 p.m.[9] When Goodusky asked, "What happened?" Frazao answered: "I was more shocked than you were. I had no idea." Goodusky asked: "Was it set up or contrived or what?" and Frazao said: "I had no idea what had happened."

> Goodusky: . . . remember I mentioned to you that "they were out to get me," more or less?
> Frazao: Well, we've known that for years.
> Goodusky: What do you mean, "We have known it?" You have known it?
> Frazao: For years.
> Goodusky: Who has known it? You have known it?
> Frazao: Ever since the incident. Let's say you have not been highly regarded by the company ever since that incident. The last incident.
> Goodusky: What was that? I forget the incident now. What was that? The Union?
> Frazao: Yes, the Union.
> Goodusky: So, you say because of the Union bit, the company would pull stuff like this, axing me?
> Frazao: That is just my opinion. I don't have anything concrete.

At another point Goodusky asks Frazao for his opinion of why they terminated him. Frazao's answer: "I wish I had an answer. I don't know. Other than the fact that he said that he smelled liquor on your breath. He said that you were drinking before." Shortly thereafter Goodusky asks: "Why do you think he did it, actually?" and Frazao answers: "I wish I knew."

A later dialogue is as follows:

> Goodusky: Actually, don't you know the company is out to get me. You are aware of that right? You are the one who told me right?
> Frazao: It is the going rumor, let's put it that way.
> Goodusky: Why is the company out to get me?
> Frazao: Because of what happened a few years back.
> Goodusky: The union, right?
> Frazao: The union and the bit with Schumann and Moed.[10]
>
> Goodusky: So that is the reason why the company is out to get me right?
> Frazao: I don't know. Maybe it is and maybe it isn't.
> Goodusky: But as far as you know, that is what you heard over the grapevine, right?
> Frazao: All I heard over the grapevine is what everybody else heard. Goodusky's on the shit list.
> Goodusky: Just please tell me the reason so I know and can sleep tight tonight. I'm on the shit list because of what reason?
> Frazao: Remember that incident with Schumann? I never even knew that existed until you told me about it. Whether or not it is because of that or whether it was because of the union, I don't know.

Andrews testified that he was aware that Goodusky had been previously discharged by Respondent, but was not aware of the circumstances involved, and he did not know of Goodusky's involvement with the Union's organization of Respondent's pharmacists. Corcoran testified that he had no knowledge of any activities by Goodusky regarding any union and in his discussions with Clayton regarding what action to take, if any, against Goodusky, the subject of the 1976 unfair labor practice charges relating to Goodusky never came up, although he was aware of the charges and the settlement. Frazao testified that he was not aware of Goodusky's prior discharge until Goodusky informed him of it sometime during the summer of 1979; he also testified that he never heard any discussions amongst Respondent's management concerning Goodusky's union activity.

There is some disagreement between the parties as to when Goodusky was discharged; the General Counsel places the date at September 24 when Goodusky was informed that he was being terminated for being under the influence of alcohol. Respondent would place the time of termination at a later date alleging that terminations are not effective until they have "made their way up the grievance ladder," therefore all the subjects brought up therein (including the prescription errors as well as his being under the influence) can be considered in reviewing the termination. Respondent's position is that Goodusky was terminated after the third-step grievance meeting on November 8.

[9] Goodusky tape recorded this conversation without Frazao's knowledge. It was properly authenticated and received into evidence. The description of this conversation, therefore, is based on the transcript of the tape recording, not the testimony at the hearing prior to the disclosure by counsel for the General Counsel that he had such a recording. It should be noted that a review of the transcript of the tape leaves little doubt that Goodusky was "baiting" Frazao into the answers he desired.

[10] There was no testimony explaining what was meant by "the bit with Schumann and Moed." Schumann had been the manager of the Park Street store.

The collective-bargaining agreement between the parties sets forth a three-step grievance procedure plus arbitration. The first step involves discussions among the grievant, union official, and the store manager. Step two provides that the union official meet with Respondent's "supervision" to attempt to settle the grievance. The third step provides:

> If the grievance is not settled, the grievance shall be referred within seven (7) days to the Employer's Labor Relations Division. The Labor Relations Division shall discuss the grievance with a Union official and endeavor to settle the grievance. In the event the grievance is not settled in the third step, it shall be submitted to arbitration in accordance with Section 3.

Corcoran testified: "As per our company policy, we are not authorized to terminate anyone without a union business agent or a union representative being present." He also testified that he had no authority to discharge an employee covered by a collective-bargaining agreement, only Respondent's director of labor relations (then Clayton) could do that, and he does not become involved in the proceedings until the third-step grievance. I am unable to find any provision in the collective-bargaining agreement supporting this testimony. Rather it appears that these agreements, like most, provide that if action is taken by Respondent against one of its employees, the Union has a right to grieve this action; there is no provision that indicates that action taken by Respondent against an employee is not effective until the third-step grievance.

On May 7 and June 11, 1980, an arbitration was conducted before Arbitrator Herbert L. Haber. The issue: "Was the discharge of Richard Goodusky for just cause? If not, what shall be the remedy?" Both sides were represented by counsel. At no point in the arbitrator's decision is there any indication that the prior unfair labor practice charge or Goodusky's union activities were ever raised as an alleged reason for his discharge. In addition, the arbitrator never discussed these issues, limiting his discussion to Goodusky's work record and attitude. The arbitrator found that the discharge was not for just cause and ordered Goodusky reinstated with half backpay, stating, inter alia," the Grievant is warned that any subsequent infractions similar to those referred to above for which discipline may be properly invoked may result in his discharge. The basis of the arbitrator's decision was, inter alia, the following:

> In the instant matter the Company has failed to establish a basis for justifying its discharge of Richard Goodusky. Whether one considers the discharge on the narrow grounds of "working under the influence of alcohol"—which is the proximate cause of the discharge and the specific reason advanced for it—or on the broader grounds of the Grievant's performance record of prescription errors, unauthorized prescription filling, poor customer relations and the drinking issue, one must conclude that discharge, at this time, is not substainable. In addition to its not following the procedures outlined in the contract with regard to discharge, the Company has failed to establish that it has any policy or practice calling for so severe a penalty being invoked against an employee with alcohol on his breath or against one who makes errors in the filling of prescriptions.

He also found: "I believe that the Grievant's overall record and his general attitude toward his work need changing and improving and I believe that some penalty in this instance will help toward achieving those changes."

IV. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

Prior to a discussion of whether Goodusky's discharge violated Section 8(a)(1),(3), or (4) of the Act it is necessary to determine whether Respondent, by Frazao, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in his conversation with Goodusky in about September. I find that it did not. Goodusky initiated the conversation by asking Frazao about Blais' comment that Respondent would have a difficult time operating the Park Street store with the leave time that Blais and Goodusky had earned. Whether I credit Goodusky or Frazao regarding this conversation, it is clear that Frazao's answer was in terms of a strictly business decision—Respondent might have to transfer one of them because of the difficulty of operating the store with two pharmacists, each of whom has accrued a large amount of leave time—rather than a threat within the proscription of Section 8(a)(1). Although Goodusky testified that later in this conversation Frazao told him that he was on Respondent's shit list, this appears to be an afterthought unconnected to the prior discussion. I will therefore dismiss this 8(a)(1) allegation.

As regards the allegation that Respondent discharged Goodusky in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act, the first issue to decide is whether deferral to the decision of the arbitrator is appropriate, as argued by Respondent. In Spielberg Manufacturing Company, 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), the Board decided that it would defer to an arbitrator's award where "the proceedings appear to have been fair and regular, all parties have agreed to be bound, and the decision of the arbitration panel is not clearly repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act." Beginning with Raytheon Company, 140 NLRB 883 (1968), the Board likewise has held that it will not defer to an arbitrator's award if the arbitrator failed to consider and rule on the unfair labor practice issue.[11] Although the proceedings herein appear to have been fair and regular, and all parties have agreed to be bound, there is no evidence that the arbitrator herein heard, considered, or ruled on the unfair labor practice issues involved herein. As the Board stated in Suburban Motor Freight, Inc., 247 NLRB 146 (1980):

> . . . we will give no deference to an arbitration award which bears no indication that the arbitrator ruled on the statutory issue of discrimination in de> termining the propriety of an employer's disciplinary actions . . . We shall impose on the party seeking Board deferral to an arbitration award the burden to prove that the issue of discrimination was litigated before the arbitrator.

The Board was more specific in its discussion of this issue in Atlantic Steel Company, 245 NLRB 814 (1979):

> Must the arbitrator actually discuss the unfair labor practice, or is it sufficient that he or she considered all of the evidence relevant to the unfair labor practice in determining whether the discharge was lawful under the contract? A review of the decisions shows that, while it may be preferrable for the arbitrator to pass on the unfair labor practice directly, the Board generally has not required that he or she do so. Rather, it is necessary only that the arbitrator has considered all of the evidence relevant to the unfair labor practice in reaching his or her decision.

The Board in Atlantic Steel also stated that "the Spielberg doctrine could be satisfied where the arbitrator's decision implicitly resolved the unfair labor practice" (emphasis supplied); and for that reason the Board in Atlantic Steel deferred to the arbitration award. Additionally, in some situations, the issues are framed in such a manner that the unfair labor practice issue will be resolved, implicitly, even without any discussion of the alleged protected activity or the NLRA. For example, in United Parcel Service, Inc., 232 NLRB 1114 (1977), enfd. 603 F.2d 1015 (D.C. Cir. 1979), the court in enforcing the Board's order deferring to the arbitrator's award, stated: "The basic question in both the contractual and statutory settings was the same: was Bloom justified under the contract to refuse to operate tractor No. 21624?"

In the situation herein, however, there was no overlap in the statutory and contractual issue; the question is whether Respondent discharged Goodusky due to his being under the influence of alcohol and his prior prescription errors or did they discharge him due to his prior activities on behalf of the Union or the prior unfair labor practice charge in which he was involved? The arbitrator only discussed the former questions. Respondent did not carry its burden under Suburban Motor Freight to establish that the unfair labor practice issue was litigated before the arbitrator. As the statutory issue was neither explicitly or implicitly decided, deferral is inappropriate herein.

Additionally, since this matter involves an alleged violation of Section 8(a)(4) as well as Section 8(a)(3), deferral is not appropriate. The Board stated in Filmation Associates, Inc., 227 NLRB 1721 (1977): "Accordingly, as we conclude that issues involving Section 8(a)(4) of the Act are solely within the Board's province to decide we will not apply the Spielberg doctrine to such issues."

Lastly, deferral is not appropriate because of the nature of the award herein. The arbitrator found that the discharge was not for just cause, and yet only granted half backpay, together with a "warning" on Goodusky's future employment conduct; I would find that this award is repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act. Triple A Machine Shop, Inc., 245 NLRB 136 (1979), stated: "The Board has indicated that it will not defer to a compromise award where the relief granted is reinstatement without backpay."[12] As this award only grants partial backpay, together with a warning, it does not warrant deferral.

Prior to discussing the merits of the General Counsel's case herein, it is necessary to dispose of a matter raised by Respondent in its brief. The argument is that the 8(a)(4) allegation must fall for the following reasons: "Goodusky testified that he had not filed the previous charge in question . . . Goodusky indicated that he never testified in any proceeding concerning charges brought by the Union after his first charge in 1976 . . . there is no evidence on the record that Goodusky helped or participated in the processing of the previous charge . . . there is no evidence that Goodusky gave an affidavit in the 1976 Board case . . . there is no indication that Goodusky was affected by the 1976 Board charge." This argument clearly has no merit. Although Goodusky did not file the charge and never did testify (since the case was settled before the hearing), the charge was filed at least partially on his behalf. Additionally, Respondent is incorrect when it alleges that he did not help or participate in the processing of the charge; he agreed to accept less than full backpay and, on that basis, that portion of the charge was settled. Finally, although there is no record evidence on the subject, I believe that I can take official notice of the fact that an alleged discriminatee for whom an unfair labor practice charge has been filed would provide an affidavit to the Board in support of the charge. As the court stated in N.L.R.B. v. Retail Store Employees Union, Local 876, 570 F.2d 586 at 591 (6th Cir. 1978), enfg. 219 NLRB 1188 (1975):

> It would make less than complete sense to protect the employee because he participates in the formal inception of the process (by filing a charge) or in the final, formal presentation, but not to protect his participation in the important developmental stages that fall between these two points in time. This would be unequal and inconsistent protection and is not the protection needed to preserve the integrity of the Board process in its entirety.

Turning now to the merits of the case, it appears to me that the General Counsel's theory herein is that Respondent maintained a grudge against Goodusky for his past actions; his support for, and assistance to the Union in its organization of Respondent's pharmacists in 1975, and his participation in, and settlement of, the unfair labor practice complaint in 1977 regarding, inter alia, his discharge.

In Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), the Board set forth the rule it will henceforth apply in cases such as the instant matter: "First, we shall require that the General Counsel make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a 'motivating factor' in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct."

[12] See also Cessna Aircraft Co., 220 NLRB 873 (1975); Sea-Land Service, Inc., 240 NLRB 1146 (1979).

Goodusky's activities on behalf of the Union after his return to Respondent's employ in 1977 were quite limited. He attended the union meetings twice a year and assisted other of Respondent's pharmacists in attending these meetings. This would not present any reason for animus on the part of Respondent toward Goodusky as there is no evidence that the existing relationship between Respondent and the Union is anything but amicable. In addition, he was a member of the Union's organizing committee, which was attempting to organize other pharmacy chains in the area; this also would not appear to engender animus on the part of Respondent; if anything, Respondent would appreciate the Union's organization of its competitor's pharmacists. It therefore appears to me that the General Counsel, in order to make its prima facie showing under Wright Line, must establish that Goodusky's pre-1977 activities on behalf of the Union were the cause of his discharge and that after his return to employment in 1977 Respondent was "laying in wait" for an opportunity to discharge him again. The General Counsel points to a number of incidents that occurred after Goodusky's return in 1977 as evidence of Respondent's animus toward him; the incident where the store's roof leaked and the then manager of the Park Street store left Goodusky mopping the floor saying that it could not happen to a better guy and the incident where the store manager told him that he would require 2 days' notice before Goodusky could take a sick day. However, both of these incidents are susceptible to several explanations; they may well have been caused by personal animosity of the managers toward Goodusky, unconnected to his activities on behalf of the Union. The fact that in about January 1979 he was given another employee handbook, which he was asked to sign for, is also not helpful to the General Counsel's case; it may be that the handbook had been changed and Goodusky, as well as the other employees, was given a new one.

What is clear is that during the Union's organizational campaign among the employees Respondent's pharmacist Goodusky was active in his support for the Union, although not the most active of Respondent's employees. Respondent's witnesses denied knowledge of the union activity by Goodusky. The General Counsel alleges that this knowledge is established through the testimony that "District Manager Moed reprimanded Goodusky and Blais about using the Company phones for union business." However, it should be noted that the record is not clear as to whether the reprimand was made by Moed or the former Park Street store manager, Schumann, and it was directed at Blais and the third pharmacist in the store at the time, as well as Goodusky. In addition, Blais places the time of this call as about 4 or 5 years prior to the hearing; it is possible that these telephone calls discussing union business occurred after the Union was certified. Lastly, the General Counsel alleges that the taped phone conversation establishes that Respondent knew of Goodusky's activities on behalf of the Union. In his brief he quotes the following dialogue:

> Frazao: Ever since the incident. Let's say you have not been highly regarded by the company ever since that incident. The last incident.
> Goodusky: What was that? I forget the incident now. What was that? The Union?
> Frazao: Yes, the Union.

What occurs next, however, is Goodusky summarizes: "So, you say because of the union bit, the company would pull stuff like this, axing me?" and Frazao answered: "that is just my opinion. I don't have anything concrete." In other places during this discussion, as well, Frazao expressed puzzlement over the discharge. Even if Frazao were more specific in his answers, they would be suspect because he was not employed by Respondent during the period that the Union was organizing Respondent's pharmacists and Goodusky was discharged, and Frazao's answers on the tape refer to "rumors" and what he "heard over the grapevine."

If this were the sole evidence of knowledge, I might find insufficient evidence of knowledge by Respondent of Goodusky's union activities. What convinces me of Respondent's knowledge is the prior unfair labor practice charge and complaint which alleged, inter alia, that he was discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. This portion of the complaint was settled by the payment to Goodusky of partial backpay for the period that he was out of work. I believe it is reasonable for me to conclude that when Respondent became aware that the Union had filed an unfair labor practice charge against it, on behalf of Goodusky, and the Board later issued a complaint alleging that its discharge of Goodusky violated the Act, and Respondent later entered into a settlement of this case with Goodusky and the Union, it knew by then (if it did not know earlier) or, at least it assumed, that he had engaged in some activities on behalf of the Union.

The strength of the General Counsel's case herein lies mainly in the weakness of Respondent's defenses. In the midst of discussing a prescription error committed by Goodusky, Andrews smelled liquor on his breath. After an initial denial, Goodusky admitted that he had a drink at lunch with his wife (an hour or two earlier). Although he offered to stop this practice, he was fired,[13] nonetheless, without any prior warning about "being under the influence." Andrews admitted that Goodusky was not intoxicated and, although he did not specifically testify so, his answers indicate that the sole indication of Goodusky's being "under the influence" was the smell of liquor on his breath, and Blais (who also testified that Goodusky was not intoxicated) could not even smell liquor on his breath. Also relevant is the fact that Goodusky had been having a drink at lunch for a number of years and Blais had knowledge of this. Because I found Blais to be a very credible witness, I would credit his testimony, and that of Goodusky, that in or about 1976 Moed told them to drink vodka instead of gin because there would be no odor, although I am cognizant of the fact that Moed did not participate in the decision to discharge Goodusky on September 24. I must also consider the fact that from January 1, 1978, until the date of the hearing, no other pharmacist was discharged by Respondent although one pharmacist was issued six form 191's and was suspended twice; three others were also suspended.

[13] I reject Respondent's argument (and Corcoran's testimony) that Goodusky was suspended pending termination and was not discharged until after the third-step grievance meeting held on November 8. Andrews testified that Corcoran told him to discharge Goodusky; the form 191 states "termination" and there is no contractual support for Respondent's argument that Corcoran had no authority to discharge employees and that Respondent was not authorized to discharge any employee included in the bergaining unit without a union representative being present.

The General Counsel points to Goodusky's telephone conversation with Frazao as evidence that his discharge was unlawfully motivated. At one point in this conversation Frazao did say that, in his opinion, Goodusky has not been highly regarded because of an incident involving the Union. However, that answer was the result of a leading question and, at other places in the conversation, Frazao said that he did not know why Goodusky was discharged other than Andrews' statement that he had been drinking. Later on during the telephone conversation, Frazao, in answer to another leading question from Goodusky, said that "maybe it is, and maybe it isn't . . . the Union and the bit with Schuman and Moed . . . ." why the Respondent was out to get him. But Frazao qualified this by saying that "It is the going rumor, let's put it that way." It should be noted that Frazao was not employed by Respondent at the time of Goodusky's earlier difficulties with Respondent and testified that his statements in this conversation regarding Respondent's negative feelings toward Goodusky derived from his conversations with Goodusky, not with anyone from management. In addition, Frazao had nothing to do with the decision to discharge Goodusky ("I was more shocked than you were."); therefore his opinion is dispositive of very little herein.

On the basis of all the above I would reluctantly find that the General Counsel has not sustained his burden of proof demanded by Wright Line. His post-1977 union activities were minimal and even worked to the benefit of Respondent. In 1975 he was not the most active supporter of the Union and, considering the degree of his union support at that time, I cannot connect his 1979 discharge with his 1975 activities, especially since there is no evidence that the relationship between Respondent and the Union is anything but amicable and during the intervening 4-year period there is a lack of proof that Respondent displayed animus toward him caused by his earlier activities on behalf of the Union. I would likewise, reluctantly, find that the General Counsel has not sustained his burden to establish that the discharge violated Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act. There is no evidence herein to establish that Respondent harbored any resentment toward Goodusky because of the charge filed on his behalf or the money paid to him in settlement of the case. Two and a half years had passed since the prior matter was disposed of; more than that fact alone is needed to connect that to his 1979 discharge.

I say "reluctantly" because this case is not without doubt. It appears to me that Respondent's discharge of Goodusky was not an appropriate reaction to the events preceding the discharge. Without any prior warning he was discharged when his supervisor smelled liquor on his breath, the result of one drink at lunch, something he had been doing for a number of years; he was not intoxicated; nor did he exhibit any sign of being intoxicated. He was the first pharmacist to be discharged by Respondent, since at least January 1978, although other pharmacists appear to have had a worse work record than he (more prescription errors and form 191's). However, I cannot substitute my judgment for Respondent's as to what is fair; I must determine if the evidence is sufficient to establish that Respondent violated Section 8(1),(3), or (4) of the Act; I find that it is not.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, Stop and Shop Companies, Inc., Medi Mart Division, is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 100, United Pharmacist's Guild, chartered by United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has not engaged in any conduct in violation of the Act as alleged herein.

Based on the entire record in this proceeding, I therefore shall make the following recommended:

ORDER[14]

It hereby is ordered that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

---

[14] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Mercury Marine Division of Brunswick Corporation and District No. 10, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO. Case 30-CA-6456

December 30, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

Upon a charge filed on April 24, 1981, by District No. 10, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, herein the Union, and duly served on Mercury Marine Division of Brunswick Corporation, herein Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 30, issued a complaint and notice of hearing on May 27, 1981, and an amendment to the complaint on August 20, 1981, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge and the complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge and amended complaint were duly served on the parties to this proceeding. On June 8, 1981, Respondent filed an answer, admitting in part and denying in part the allegations of the complaint, submitting affirmative defenses, and requesting that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

On August 27, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a motion to transfer the proceeding to the Board and a Motion for Summary Judgment. The General Counsel submits, inter alia, that Respondent, in its answer, is merely attempting to relitigate matters which could or should have been litigated in the unit clarification proceeding, Case 30-UC-158. Subsequently, on September 1, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Respondent thereafter filed a brief letter response to the Notice To Show Cause.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

In its answer to the complaint and opposition to the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment, Respondent admits the refusal to bargain as to employees classified as Process Coordinator I's but contends that it did not violate the Act because such employees are not properly part of the appropriate unit represented by the Union.[1] Respondent predicates its refusal to bargain on the following grounds. Respondent contends that during the term of the collective-bargaining agreement effective June 19, 1978, to June 15, 1980, it was determined through the grievance arbitration procedures that Process Coordinator I's were not within the collective-bargaining unit. Respondent also contends that during subsequent negotiations the Union unsuccessfully sought to have Process Coordinator I's included in the unit and that the current agreement effective June 16, 1980, to June 18, 1982, does not cover the Process Coordinator I's.

As to the allegations covering the Board Decision reported at 254 NLRB 1120 (1981), Respondent admits that the Board issued a decision on review but contends that the decision was erroneous, unsupported by substantial evidence on the record and violated due process. Respondent further contends that the case should have been remanded to the Regional Office for a hearing on the issues of fact concerning bargaining negotiations leading to the 1980-82 agreement and the impact of such negotiations on the contractual recognition articles.

In addition, Respondent contends that the Process Coordinator I's cannot be part of the production and maintenance unit because the duties of such persons make them supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. Further, Respondent contends that subsequent to the submission of the record to the Regional Director and prior to the decision by the Board in Case 30-UC-158 numerous changes were made in the position of Process Coordinator I and that these changes compel a finding that Process Coordinator I's are statutory supervisors, and that, even assuming the validity of the Board's Decision, those employees should be excluded from the unit.

Finally, Respondent admits the factual allegations concerning the refusal to bargain with the Union as to the Process Coordinator I's on April 24, 1981, but it denies the conclusionary legal allegations regarding the refusal to bargain.

[1] Respondent also admitted the factual and legal allegations pertaining to service of the charge and complaint, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act, and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act. In addition to other allegations of the complaint that Respondent denied, which are described elsewhere in this Decision, Respondent also denied the complaint allegation in par. 4(a) regarding the scope of the unit, and claimed instead that the Union has been designated the exclusive bargaining representative for certain production and maintenance employees at Respondent's Fond du Lac facility. Thereafter, the General Counsel amended par. 4(a) of the complaint to describe the unit as certain production and maintenance employees, thereby accommodating Respondent's answer in this respect.

It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues which were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding.[2]

In her Motion for Summary Judgment, counsel for the General Counsel urges that Respondent, by its answer and refusal to bargain, is merely attempting to relitigate matters which could or should have been litigated in the unit clarification proceeding, and that the issues raised by Respondent as a justification for a hearing are either irrelevant or insufficient as a matter of law to justify a hearing now. We agree.

Respondent's contention that the Board should defer to the arbitrator's decision was previously litigated before the Board in Case 30-UC-158, reported at 254 NLRB 1120 (1981). There the Board noted that issues concerning the appropriateness of bargaining units are particularly within the Board's expertise and the Board does not defer to such an award.

Respondent's reliance on the Union's failure to insist that Process Coordinator I's be included in the unit during contract negotiations that took place after the Union filed the petition in Case 30-UC-158 is similarly misplaced. The Board has long held that where, as here, the petition was filed before the negotiations the opposing party was on notice that the petitioner intended to resolve the unit issue through the Board's procedures rather than through negotiations.[3] We find it unnecessary, therefore, to resolve any disputed factual allegations concerning the post-petition contract negotiations.[4]

As to Respondent's contention that Process Coordinator I's are statutory supervisors and therefore must be excluded from the unit, we note that this issue was raised and litigated during the unit clarification proceeding (30-UC-158) supra. As such, this issue cannot be relitigated now, absent newly discovered evidence or special circumstances. In this connection, Respondent has sought to introduce evidence that the disputed employees' job duties have changed substantially since the Board's Decision issued. This assertion, if true, would not change the result here but would constitute additional evidence of Respondent's refusal to bargain with the Union since it would have made unilateral changes without bargaining.[5]

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, a Delaware corporation, with an office and place of business in Fond Du Lac, Wisconsin. It is engaged in the manufacture and nonretail distribution of marine propulsion equipment. During the past calendar year, a representative period, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, sold and shipped from the Fond du Lac facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of Wisconsin.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

District No. 10, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

For over 20 years, and at all times material herein, the Union has been the designated exclusive collective-bargaining representative of certain production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its Fond du Lac facility and has been recognized as such representative by Respondent. Such recognition has been embodied in successive collective-bargaining agreements, the most recent of which is effective by its terms for the period June 16, 1980, through June 15, 1982.

[4] The Union denied that any acquiescience occurred regarding the Process Coordinator I's during the negotiations.

We note that Respondent claims the Union unsuccessfully sought inclusion of the Process Coordinator I's during recent negotiations but does not claim the Union withdrew its claim in exchange for other concessions during negotations. See WNYS-(WIXT), supra at 170.

[5] See Highland Terrace Convalescent Center, 233 NLRB 87 (1977).

In this connection, it is well settled that an employer has a duty to bargain when it changes the duties of bargaining unit employees' classification which result in the employees' removal from the bargaining unit to supervisory positions. See Kendall College, 228 NLRB 1083 (1977), enfd. 570 F.2d 216 (7th Cir. 1978); and Fry Foods, Inc., 241 NLRB 76 (1979).

On March 5, 1981, the Board issued a Decision on Review and Order in Case 30-UC-158, reported at 254 NLRB 1120, clarifying the unit referred to above by including therein the employees classified as Process Coordinator I who are employed by Respondent at its Fond du Lac facility.

The unit of employees described in the Board's Decision, above, and set forth below, constitutes a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All production and maintenance employees, including all classifications in the Production Departments, the Production Tool Room, the Machine Shop, the Testing Department, the Maintenance Department, Buildings and Grounds, Oil Facility, the Foundry Facility, Die Cast Facility, including Process Coordinator I's, Customer Service and Repair Departments, Floor Inspectors, Final Inspectors, and Salvage Inspectors in the Inspection Department, Time Recording Clerks, Lead persons, Mechanic Specialists, Cycle Counters, Distribution Facility, Shipping and Receiving Department, Investment Castings Facility, and all other production and maintenance departments which may be added to the collective bargaining unit in the future covered by an agreement, but excluding all executives, office and clerical employees, laboratory employees, professional employees, sales representatives, product development and testing personnel, layout inspectors, paint inspectors, final line inspectors, watchpersons, guards and supervisory employees as defined in the Labor-Management Relations Act.

As indicated above, Respondent has admitted the factual allegations in the complaint to the effect that the Union requested, in March 1981, that Respondent bargain collectively with it concerning the wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of Respondent's employees classified as Process Coordinator I's and that, thereafter, Respondent has failed and refused to bargain with the Union concerning such terms and conditions of employment of the employees classified as Process Coordinator I's.[6]

We find that by the aforesaid conduct Respondent has refused to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit and that such conduct violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Mercury Marine Division of Brunswick Corporation is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. District No. 10, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All production and maintenance employees, including all classifications in the Production Departments, the Production Tool Room, the Machine Shop, the Testing Department, the Maintenance Department, Buildings and Grounds, Oil Facility, the Foundry Facility, Die Cast Facility, including Process Coordinator I's, Customer Service and Repair Department, Floor Inspectors, Final Inspectors, and Salvage Inspectors in the Inspection Department, Time Recording Clerks, Lead persons, Mechanic Specialists, Cycle Counters, Distribution Facility, Shipping and Receiving Department, Investment Castings Facility, and all other production and maintenance departments which may be added to the collective-bargaining unit in the future covered by an agreement, but excluding all executives, office and clerical employees, laboratory employees, professional employees, sales representatives, product development and testing personnel, layout inspectors, paint inspectors, final line inspectors, watchpersons, guards and supervisory employees as defined in the Labor-Management Relations Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

[6] In its motion to transfer the proceeding to the Board and Motion for Summary Judgment, the General Counsel presented certain exhibits that reveal the chronology of the refusal to bargain as follows. In or about the second week of March 1981, the Union, by its business representative, Joseph Develice, orally requested that Respondent bargain with it concerning the wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment of the employees classified as Process Coordinator I pursuant to the Board's Decision. On or about March 27, 1981, the Union, by certified letter from Directing Business Representative Richard A. Presser to Respondent's Manager of Public Relations Ronald Hanson, again requested bargaining concerning the employees classified as Process Coordinator I. On or about April 15, 1981, Respondent by Hanson, orally refused to bargain regarding the Process Coordinator I's, and informed union business representative Develice that Respondent did not intend to abide by the Board's Decision.

4. At all times material herein, the Union has been the exclusive representative of all the employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By failing and refusing to bargain with the Union concerning the wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit classified as Process Coordinator I, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Any understanding reached shall be embodied in a signed agreement.

(b) Post at its facility in Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 30, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

Case 15-CA-7622

December 30, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On May 4, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Thomas R. Wilks issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, counsel for the Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the Administrative Law Judge.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.[3]

The Administrative Law Judge found, and we agree, that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to provide the information requested by the Union concerning their alleged "double breasted" nonunion companies. In doing so, he stated that the Union never contended that the information sought was essential for bargaining. Regardless of whether the Union did or did not so contend, it is clear from the record that the Union needed and sought the said information to police the existing agreement and to prepare for bargaining negotiations. We further find that the Union bargained as best it could in light of Respondent's prior refusal to furnish the information and its disparaging remarks during negotiations concerning the Union's requests, and that during negotiations the Union informed Respondent's negotiating committee chairman that it "was waiting for an answer" to its request for said information.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Leonard B. Hebert, Jr., & Co., Inc.; Landis Construction Company, Inc.; Pratt Farnsworth, Inc.; Boh Bros. Construction Co., Inc.; American Gulf Enterprises, Inc.; Gutler-Herbert & Co., Inc.; Pittman Construction Company, Inc.; Bartley, Incorporated; Binnings Construction Co., Inc.; and Gervais Favrot Company, Inc., New Orleans, Louisiana, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the actions set forth in the said recommended Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

THOMAS R. WILKS, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard on February 24, 1981, at New Orleans, Louisiana, pursuant to a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 15 on August 6, 1980, which alleges that the above-captioned Employers, herein referred to individually and collectively as the Respondents, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, by refusing to bargain in good faith with the above-captioned labor organization, herein referred to as the Union, in that they refused to furnish the Union with certain information. The Respondents filed an answer denying the commission of any unfair labor practices.

Upon the entire record, my observation of witnesses, and consideration of the post-hearing briefs, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENTS

With the exception of Pittman Construction Company, Inc., which is a Delaware corporation, the following named Respondents are Louisiana corporations which, in addition to Pittman Construction Company, Inc., maintain offices and facilities in the New Orleans, Louisiana, metropolitan area where they are engaged in the building and construction business: Leonard B. Herbert, Jr. & Co., Inc.; Landis Construction Company, Inc.; Pratt Farnsworth, Inc.; Boh Bros. Construction Co., Inc.; American Gulf Enterprises, Inc.; Gutler-Herbert & Co., Inc.; Bartley, Incorporated; Binnings Construction Co., Inc.; Gervais F. Favrot Company, Inc.

During the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint, a period representative of all times material herein, the foregoing named Respondents, each individually, in the course and conduct of their business, purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000, which goods and materials were shipped directly to their respective operations located in the metropolitan area of New Orleans, Louisiana, from points located outside the State of Louisiana.

It is admitted and I find that the Respondents are, individually and collectively, and have been at all times material herein, employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The complaint alleges that since at least May 1, 1977, and at all times thereafter, and continuing to date, the Union has been, and is now, the representative for the purposes of collective bargaining of a majority of the employees in an appropriate unit and, by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, has been, and is now, the exclusive representative of all employees in said unit for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment; and that the unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act is as follows:

> All carpenters employed by Respondents, individually and collectively, on their construction projects located within the geographical jurisdiction of the Union, excluding all other employees.

The Respondents admitted the foregoing allegations but amended the answer at the hearing to admit that the Union is the designated bargaining agent for employees in individual bargaining units but that the Respondents deny the existence of a multiemployer bargaining unit.

The record reveals that the Respondents and the Union have, since at least 1961, maintained a collective-bargaining relationship and have entered into successive collective-bargaining agreements which embody rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment. The last two contracts in that series of contracts were in effect during the periods of May 1, 1977, to April 30, 1980, and May 1, 1980, to April 30, 1982, and reveal that the Respondents are signatory thereto and parties thereby as members of the New Orleans District, Associated General Contractors of Louisiana, Inc. (herein called AGC). Those contracts further indicate that the AGC "and such other Employers for whom the [AGC] has bargained" are parties thereto and referred to therein as "contractors" or "Employers." The recognition clause therein states:

> The Contractors, during the life of this agreement, recognize the Unions as the exclusive bargaining representatives for all of their employees coming under the respective jurisdiction of the Unions for the purpose of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, fringes, hours of employment and other conditions of employment.

There is uncontradicted record testimony to the effect that a committee of the AGC engaged in joint bargaining with the Union on behalf of the Respondents. Accordingly, I conclude that the General Counsel has sustained its burden of proof with respect to the aforesaid allegations concerning the individual and collective nature of the bargaining unit. In any event, it is clear that the Respondents had an obligation to bargain with the Union concerning wages, hours, and conditions of employment of carpenters located within the geographical jurisdiction of the Union, whether individually or collectively.

Davy P. Laborde, Sr., the business representative of the Union, testified that he has participated in negotiations with the Respondents since 1961. In response to cross-examination, Laborde testified that for several years he had received reports from agents of the Union and other persons engaged in the construction business to the effect that some of the Respondents had formed "double breasted" companies to perform unit work with nonunion employees. Laborde testified in further cross-examination that on one occasion he had made a fruitless investigation of citings of certain machinery owned by a respondent at a jobsite of a construction company whose employees were unrepresented by the Union and where unit work was performed. Employees of one of the Respondents had also informed Laborde on another occasion that they requested the withdrawal of their union cards upon commencement of employment at a reputed "double breasted" company.

In past negotiations with the Respondents on at least two occasions Laborde proposed the incorporation into the collective-bargaining agreement of a so-called subidiary clause, for the purpose of automatically extending the coverage of the collective-bargaining agreement to additional enterprises formed by the Respondents. These attempts failed. Laborde testified, without contradiction, that he ceased such efforts in that the Respondents had continually refused to answer his inquiries as to other related companies and adamantly insisted that they maintained no double-breasted operations.

On December 15, 1978, pursuant to a representation petition filed by the Union, and a hearing conducted on November 27, 1978, the Acting Regional Director for Region 15, in Case 15-RC-6380, directed an election in a carpenters' unit at Claiborne Builders, Inc., in or near New Orleans, Louisiana. An election was conducted on January 12, 1979. Laborde testified that he engaged in a conversation on the day of that election at the Claiborne place of business with Joe Lemoine who identified himself as the treasurer of Claiborne as well as the treasurer of Perrilliet-Rickey Construction Company, Inc., which Laborde discovered then to have occupied a common premises with Claiborne.[1] Laborde testified, without contradiction and with substantial corroboration by Union Agent James Paulino, Jr., who was present, that Lemoine explained to him that Perrilliet-Rickey had formed a secondary company, i.e., Claiborne, for the purpose of competing against other "double-breasted" companies that were formed by other parties to collective-bargaining agreement; i.e., the Respondents. Although Laborde had initially fixed the date of this conversation in November 1979, he retracted his testimony to place it in January, the date of the election, having explained his confusion as to the month of the hearing and month of the election. Despite his initial confusion, I credit his uncontradicted testimony as to the substance of the conversation and to the fact that it occurred on the date of the election at Claiborne.

Paulino in his uncontradicted testimony added that, during this conversation when Lemoine asked why the Union was seeking an election at Claiborne, he, Paulino, responded: ". . . that we were going to try to organize all the non-union companies that we felt were offsprings from union companies."

Laborde testified that thereafter he determined that it was necessary to obtain information from the Respondents concerning the existence of any double-breasted enterprises in order to discover whether the Respondents had violated the collective-bargaining agreement by failing to extend the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement to the employees of such companies. Additionally, he determined that such information would assist him in contract negotiations with the Respondents with regard to two areas; e.g., whether he would revive his request for the 25 subsidiary clause, and what positions the Union should take with respect to economic issues. With respect to possible economic positions he explained that such could have been affected by knowledge of what the Respondents were affording nonunion employees of affiliated companies. That is to say, for example, he might modify his 30 economic demands if a risk existed of losing unit work to the nonunion affiliated companies.

Between January 18 and February 12, 1980, prior to the April 30, 1980, expiration date of the collective-bargaining agreement, the Union, by individual letters, requested of the Respondents answers to 13 questions, which the Union in its letter explained were necessary because of information it had obtained to the effect that the individual respondent had by the operation of a specifically named enterprise performed work which otherwise would have been performed by the Respondents and by such conduct the Respondents might be in violation of the collective-bargaining agreement provisions; i.e. "wages, scope of agreement, referral clause, fringe benefit provisions and recognition and possibly other articles." The questions are set forth as follows with the exception that the name of each alleged double-breasted company is replaced herein by the designation "other company."

> 1. What positions in [other Company] are held by each officer, shareholder, director or other management representative of your company?
> 2. State the name of each person who has a function related to labor relations for your Company and for [other Company]?
> 3. What customers of [other Company] are now or were formerly customers for your Company?
> 4. State the difference, if any, in the type of business engaged in by your Company and [other Company].
> 5. What services, including clerical, administrative, bookkeeping, managerial, engineering, estimating, or other services are performed for [other Company] by or at your Company?

---

[1] Perrilliet-Rickey Construction Company, Inc., was a member of the AGC and a party to the contract which expired on April 30, 1980. It was named in the instant unfair labor practice charge as was the AGC but, like the AGC, was not named in the complaint. The General Counsel stated in its brief that Perrilliet-Rickey timely withdrew from the AGC and accordingly was not named in the complaint.

6. What supervisory functions are performed by employees of your Company over employees of [other Company]?

7. What insurance or other benefits are shared in common by employees of your Company and the employees of [other Company]?

8. What skills do the employees of [other Company] possess that employees of your Company possess?

9. Please list all former employees of your Company that are now employed by [other Company] and their titles.

10. State whether [other Company] is a member of the Associated General Contractors of Louisiana, Inc.

11. Does [other Company] have separate contractor license, bank account, books, insurance policies, tax returns than your Company?

12. Was there any leasing of equipment between the two companies during the last year and was it done by written agreement?

13. Was there any interchange of employees in the field during the last year between the two companies?

The Respondents all declined to provide the requested information. Thereafter, negotiations for the most recent collective-bargaining agreement transpired and resulted in a new agreement prior to the expiration date of the old contract. The instant unfair labor practice charge had been filed on March 14, 1980.

I credit Laborde's more certain testimony that during the recent contract negotiations Robert Boh, president of Respondent Boh Bros. Construction Co., president of the AGC, and chairman of the contractors negotiation committee, referred disparagingly to the aforedescribed information request letters and to the instant unfair labor practice charge. However, Boh testified without contradiction that the Union sought no contractual modification concerning alleged double-breasted companies, nor did it state that it could not bargain effectively without the aforesaid requested information. Moreover, Laborde conceded that he said nothing more concerning the requested information other than, "Well, you received my letter, but that's it, I'm waiting for an answer." I credit his testimony.

Laborde testified that, although the collective-bargaining agreement provides for a grievance procedure, the Union chose rather to file the instant unfair labor practice charge in order to obtain the information necessary to support a grievance. Some testimony was adduced by the Respondents in cross- examination of Laborde to the effect that in June 1980 the Union filed a certain lawsuit against one of the Respondents, Pratt Farnsworth, Inc., and an alleged double-breasted company, wherein the Union alleged that the two companies constituted a single integrated employer. Laborde explained that at the time of the lawsuit he did have some information as to that individual respondent to support the suit, but that "as we go along we pick up information," and that he is continually "picking up information." Laborde testified that he consulted with an attorney as to the most efficacious manner in which to proceed.

Conclusion

The General Counsel contends that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to provide to the Union requested information concerning alleged double-breasted operations to which the Union was entitled in order properly to represent bargaining unit employees.

The Respondents take the position that the Union has failed to demonstrate a relevant need for the information requested, and that the actual purpose for which the information was sought—organizing—is irrelevant thereby excusing the Respondents of any obligation to provide same.

The Respondents argue that the information is not necessary for the administration of the contract because, despite a long history of contractual relations, such information was never previously requested. It argues that the information was not necessary to further the Union's duty of fair representation because the Union failed to prove that it needed the information for fair representation of employees and that there is no actual evidence adduced herein that the Union represents any employees of the alleged double-breasted companies.

With respect to negotiations, the Respondents assert that, in view of the Union's lack of persistence for the information during the bargaining process, it truly did not need that information; and that in any event it did not ask for other information that would have been necessary to support its economic position in bargaining.

The Respondents conclude, correctly, that the primary purpose advanced by the Union for the information was to discover whether any of the Respondents were acting as a single integrated employer with any other companies. The Respondents dismiss this objective because it concludes that the Union "already knew" that Perrilliet-Rickey and Claiborne, who are not respondents herein, were operating as separate employers having had "an official decision" of the Acting Regional Director in the representation case, and because the Union filed the lawsuit in June 1980 against another individual Respondent. The Respondents argue that the Union could have filed a unit clarification petition with the Regional Director to obtain the same information if it indeed really desired the information for the stated purpose. The Respondents further argue that if the Union believed that the contract was violated it could have filed a grievance. The Respondents conclude that the true reason for the Union's information request was a desire to engage in organizational activity, and that the Respondents are under no obligation to assist such effort. Finally, the Respondents contend that certain questions are unrelated to any proffered reason; i.e., identity of customers and membership in the AGC.

An employer is obliged by the Act to bargain in good faith with the employees' designated bargaining agent and a failure to furnish to the union requested information which is relevant to the negotiation of and administration of a collective-bargaining agreement may constitute a breach of that obligation. Detroit Edison Company v. N.L.R.B., 440 U.S. 301, 303 (1979); N.L.R.B. v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432, 435–436 (1967); N.L.R.B. v. Truitt Mfg., Co., 351 U.S. 149, 152 (1956). Information concerning terms and conditions of employment within the bargaining unit is presumptively relevant and no specific showing of relevance is required, but as to areas outside the unit a more restrictive standard of relevance is applied. Ohio Power Company, 216 NLRB 987, 991 (1975).

In Associated General Contractors of California, 242 NLRB 891 (1979), enfd. 633 F.2d 766 (9th Cir. 1980), the Board considered the issue of whether a union was entitled to receive from a multiemployer bargaining association a list of "open shop" members. Prior to the information request, the union therein had become aware of the employer association's activities in encouraging and aiding the expansion of open shop and "double breasted" ventures by its employer-members and prospective members. The Board observed that, with respect to a "double breasted" operation, i.e., a contractor who operates a union company and a nonunion company may, depending upon the factual configuration, effectuate a single appropriate bargaining unit, or separate units. The Board noted that, where a single unit has been effectuated, the collective-bargaining unit may be held to cover the nonunion employees as well, or the employer may be obliged to bargain on behalf of both enterprises with the collective-bargaining agent of the unionized entity.[2] Accordingly, the Board concluded that the Union's principal purpose in seeking the data was to "facilitate inquiry" into whether or not some of the employer association's open-shop members were bound by the collective-bargaining agreements and included in the represented units. The Board stated:

> They [unions] are entitled to the requested information under the "discovery-type" standard enumerated in N.L.R.B. v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. at 437, to judge for themselves whether to press their claims in the contractual grievance procedure, or before the Board or courts, or through remedial provisions in the contracts under negotiation. The Torrington Company v. N.L.R.B., 545 F.2d 840 (2d Cir. 1976). It is certainly well within the statutory responsibilities of the Unions to scrutinize closely all facets relating to the diversion or preservation of bargaining unit work and, therefore, they are fully warranted in any reasonable probing of data concerning the exclusion of the employees of certain AGC members from the bargaining units. [242 NLRB at 894, citing N.L.R.B. v. Rockwell-Standard Corporation, Transmission and Axle Division, Forge Division, 410 F.2d 953, 957 (6th Cir. 1969); Curtiss-Wright Corporation v. N.L.R.B., 347 F.2d 61 (3d Cir. 1965).][3]

The Board also held that, even if the information was also sought by the Union for organizing purposes, it was nonetheless entitled to the information sought inasmuch as a request for information made for a proper and legitimate purpose is not vitiated by the coexistence of other purposes, or that other uses can be made of such information.[4]

In Doubarn Sheet Metal, Inc., 243 NLRB 821 (1979), the Board considered issues similar, if not identical, to those raised in this case. Therein the labor organization had received "information" that a certain enterprise was performing with nonunit employees work which was of a type normally performed, and which previously had been performed by the employer with unit employees. The union thereafter by letter requested of the employer answers to seven questions concerning the business relationship of the employer with the other enterprise. Of those questions 6 are virtually the same as 6 of the 13 questions posed by the Union to the Respondents herein. The employer there, as in this case, contended that the information requested was irrelevant. The Board found that the data sought provided information as to whether a single-employer situation existed or whether the employer had assigned or contracted work to the other enterprise and therefore served the purpose of assisting the union by supporting its contention that the employer as a single employer with the other company was not meeting contractual obligations, e.g., wage scale and union security, or as a separate employer had violated contractual provisions concerning subcontracting or the industry protection clause of the collective-bargaining agreement. The Board held that the union had demonstrated the "reasonable and probable relevance" of such information in regard to its contentions of contract violations, and rejected the employer's argument that the union was obliged to demonstrate actual instances of contractual violations as a condition precedent to the employer's obligation to provide the information. The Board also rejected the argument that the union's contentions as to contract violations constituted "mere speculation or suspicion." The Board noted that the bona fides of the union's receipt of "information" was unchallenged.[5]

The Board's Decision in the Doubarn and AGC of California cases are dispositive of the issues in this case. The Union herein obtained "information" to the effect that the Respondents were forming double-breasted operations. It is not necessary that this "information" be shown to be accurate, nonhearsay, or otherwise admissible in a court of law, or even ultimately reliable. However, coming from several sources, including an employer party to the contract and at that time a member of the AGC, I conclude that the information was such as to warrant the inference that the Union, in consequence, entertained bona fide questions concerning the existence and nature of related operations of the Respondents. I conclude that the answers to these questions necessitated information that was of reasonable or probable relevance to the Union's effective performance as administrator and negotiator of the collective-bargaining agreement. Furthermore, as the Board observed, in the AGC of California case, the data which was sought, was sought for the primary purpose of ascertaining whether or not other specifically identified operations were so related to the Respondents' operations by a variety of factors such as to encompass the other employees within the unit. If, in fact, those employees were within the same unit, information as to them would be presumptively valid. Accordingly, I conclude that information necessary to resolve a bona fide question as to whether the collective-bargaining unit has expanded is presumptively relevant.

[3] The Board noted, however, that assuming arguendo that the information sought was not otherwise "presumptively relevant" under the discovery standard of the Acme Industrial Co. case, the relevance was established on the record before it. Ibid.

[5] The parties therein had stipulated that the union had "received information" as set forth above. The stipulation did not specify the precise nature of that information, and the Board appears not to have considered the nature or source of the information.

The Respondents' arguments that the Union's sole purpose in seeking the information was for organizational purposes are unconvincing. The Union may very well have desired to organize these other operations, but such organizing effort would be unnecessary if the Union could ascertain that these other operations constituted mere extensions of the collective-bargaining units which it represents.

Furthermore, there is no basis on which to infer that the Union already possessed conclusive information that these other operations constituted separate and distinct employing entities with separate bargaining units, as suggested by the Respondents. The answer to the Respondents' questions as to why the Union did not press for the so-called subsidiary clause in negotiations, and why it did not adduce evidence herein that it represented employees in the other companies, is self-evident; i.e., it did not have sufficient information to support its position, ergo its request for same. The Respondents ask, if the Union needed the information to bargain effectively, why did it not insist on the requested information in the 1980 negotiations? The answer is that the Union had already made a formal written request and had filed an unfair labor practice charge upon the Respondents' refusal to supply the information. That the Union proceeded with negotiations without the information does not indicate that the information was irrelevant to its secondary purpose nor that it would not have assisted the Union in bargaining. The Union never contended that the information was essential for bargaining nor that it was the sine qua non for bargaining, but only claimed that it would have assisted it in bargaining. The Respondents' contention that the requested information was too incomplete to assist the Union in bargaining again does not render it unrelated to that purpose. Perhaps the Union could have asked for more complete information, but what it did ask for was not unrelated to the secondary purposes as stated by Union Agent Laborde. In any event the information was clearly related to the primary purpose stated by the Union.

The Respondents argue that the stated primary purpose of the requested data, i.e., the ascertainment of whether the Respondents were acting as a single integrated employer with other companies, must be rejected as not being the true purpose. The Respondents claim that the Acting Regional Director had made a finding in a representation case that Perrilliet-Rickey and Claiborne were separate employer and therefore the Union was already aware of that status when it requested the same information from Perrilliet-Rickey. However, Perrilliet-Rickey is not a respondent herein. In any event, Laborde's credible testimony reveals that his conversation with Lemoine occurred after the Acting Regional Director's decision and thus he did not have sufficient information to sustain a contrary position in the representation case.

Respondent suggests that the Union must have had sufficient information regarding Pratt Farnsworth in that the Union had filed a lawsuit in which it contended that a single integrated enterprise existed. However, the nature of the law suit, the issues involved, and the decision therein are unknown. Whatever information the Union may have had regarding Pratt Farnsworth for purposes of that lawsuit, it is not shown that such information was identical to that requested in this proceeding. With respect to the Respondents' suggestions that the Union could have proceeded with a unit clarification petition with the Board, or could have filed a grievance, such action would have been fruitless without information to sustain such action. As the Board has noted, a union is entitled to seek information under discovery-type standards by which it can judge for itself whether to press its claim before the Board, the courts, or in a grievance procedure.

Finally, contrary to the Respondents, I conclude that all the questions posed by the Union to the Respondents are manifestly related to the primary purposes for which the information was sought, in view of the totality of factors the Board considers in deciding whether or not an "arm's length relationship" exists between unintegrated companies. Don Burgess Construction Co., supra; see also Erlichs' Inc., 231 NLRB 1237, 1242–44 (1977); Great Chinese American Sewing Co., 227 NLRB 1670, 1678 (1977); Altemose Construction Company, 210 NLRB 138 (1974).

Accordingly, I conclude that the Union by its letters of January 18 and February 12, 1980, addressed to the Respondents requested information that was relevant and necessary to the performance of its obligations as bargaining agent for the Respondents' employees; i.e., the administration and negotiation of collective-bargaining agreements with the Respondents. I therefore find that the Respondents, by failing and refusing to provide the information requested by the Union, violated and is violating Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondents are, individually and collectively, employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By failing and refusing to provide the Union with the information it requested in its letters to the Respondents of January 18 and February 12, 1980, the Respondents have each engaged in and are engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER DENYING MOTION

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On August 28, 1981, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision, Order, and Direction of Second Election[1] in the above-entitled proceeding finding that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by soliciting grievances from an employee and implying that such grievances would be remedied; by threatening employees with discharge for engaging in lawful union activity; by threatening employees with hospital closure in the event the employees select a union as their collective-bargaining agent; and by soliciting employees to form an independent, internal union. In light of Respondent's unfair labor practices, the Board further ordered that the election in Case 19-RC-9356 be set aside and directed the Regional Director for Region 19 to conduct a new election.

Thereafter, on September 8, 1981, Respondent filed a Motion for Reconsideration, and on September 25, 1981, Respondent submitted a brief in support thereof.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

In its motion, Respondent argues that the Board erred in finding that Dr. David Shrader and Dr. Thomas Richtsmeier are managerial employees. Respondent also contends that the Board erred in concluding that the conversation between Acting Director of Nursing Garnet Brown and employee Betty Anderson constituted an unlawful solicitation of grievances carrying an implied promise to remedy the grievances.

It is hereby ordered that the Respondent's Motion for Reconsideration be, and it hereby is, denied as lacking in merit and as raising nothing not previously considered by the Board.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On May 26, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Robert W. Leiner issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent filed an answering brief in support of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified below.[1]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

---

[1] In dismissing the complaint, the Administrative Law Judge made an alternative finding that Flynn, assistant to the director of the Eastern Conference of Teamsters, waived any objection to the cancellation of the leases at the January 25, 1980, bargaining session. In adopting his finding, we do not rely on or find it necessary to reach his alternative finding.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT W. LEINER, Administrative Law Judge: This matter was heard before me in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on February 9, 1981, upon a complaint and notice of hearing dated July 17, 1980, and Respondent's duly filed answer.[1] The complaint alleges a violation of Section 8(a)(3), (5), and (1) of the Act, by virtue of Respondent DeBolt Transfer Company unlawfully bypassing the Union and dealing directly with unit employees; by unilaterally implementing changes in terms and conditions of employment without bargaining with or receiving the consent of the Union; and by unlawfully terminating the employment of six employees, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Respondent admits various allegations of the complaint but denies any violation of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. §151 et seq., herein called the Act.

At the hearing, the parties were represented by counsel and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to introduce and meet material evidence, to call and examine witnesses, and to present oral argument. At the conclusion of receipt of the evidence, the parties waived oral argument. Respondent and the General Counsel filed post-hearing briefs. Upon consideration of the entire record, including the briefs, and my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following:

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that at all material times, Respondent, a Pennsylvania corporation with terminal facilities located in Homestead and Ambridge, Pennsylvania, is a common carrier engaged in intrastate and interstate transportation of freight and steel commodities. In the 12-month period ending June 30, 1980, Respondent, in its business operations, derived gross revenues in excess of $50,000 for the transportation of freight from the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania directly to points outside that State. Respondent admits that, at all material times, it has been and is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Teamsters' Steel Haulers Local Union No. 800, is, and has been at all material times, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The parties agree that for purposes of this proceeding, Respondent maintains two trucking terminals: Homestead and Ambridge, Pennsylvania. At both locations, Respondent's employees include not only drivers who operate Respondent's own tractors and trailers but also employees known as "owner-operators" who, while employees of Respondent, drive tractors and trailers which they lease to Respondent. Drivers, other than the owner-operators, operate, but do not own, equipment and do not lease the equipment to Respondent.

Aside from other company drivers at both of its locations, at all material times, Respondent employed four owner-operators at the Homestead terminal; two owner-operators at the Ambridge terminal. The owner-operators at both of the terminals are represented by Local 800 of the Teamsters; the other drivers at both terminals are represented by other Teamsters locals: Teamsters Local 249, Homestead, and Teamsters Local 261, Ambridge.

Local 800, founded in the early 1970's, represents employees who are owner-operators of steel-hauling tractors and/or trailers for steel-hauling employers. At the Homestead terminal, Respondent maintained the practice of leasing tractors and trailers from owner-operators for a period of more than 5 years; at the Ambridge terminal for a period of 6 months, both periods occurring before, and ending with Local 800's strike against, inter alia, DeBolt in the period August 1979 through January 25, 1980. The ordinary leasing practice both at Ambridge and Homestead was for Respondent to lease from a single owner-operator both his tractor and trailer. Indeed, it was rare that Respondent leased only a trailer or a tractor.

Along with other employers in the eastern United States engaged in the iron and steel trucking business, Respondent, in the period April 1, 1976, through March 31, 1979, was a party to the National Master Freight Agreement (herein called NMFA) with the Eastern Conference of the Teamsters Union and the several local unions representing its employees. Although the record is not clear as to when Respondent (as an independent employer rather than as a member of any multiemployer group) executed this expired agreement (G.C. Exh. 4), there is no dispute that it was bound by that agreement. The record shows that there was no successor agreement executed upon the termination of this 1976-79 NMFA and this resulted in the above strike of August 1979. Thereafter, the employers in the industry, including Respondent, about January 1980, executed a further NMFA effective for the period April 1, 1979, through March 31, 1982. (G.C. Exh. 3; herein sometimes known in the record as "the Red Book.")[2]

The parties agree that the current NMFA provides, in detail, for the terms and conditions of employment of owner-operators including the applicability of grievance procedures (art. 8; art. 44-45) and the compensation of the owner-operators (arts. 22, 55, and 61).

It should be noted, in particular, that art. 55, section 18 (G.C. Exh. 3, the current NMFA) dealing with owner-operators, states, inter alia, that the employer is prohibited from putting into operation any "scheme" to defeat the terms of the agreement "wherein the [contract] provisions as to compensation for services on and for use of equipment owned by owner-operator shall be lessened, nor shall any owner-operators' lease be cancelled for the purpose of depriving employees of employment and any such complaint that should arise pertaining to such cancellation . . . shall be subject to Article 44 . . . ." Section 44 provides, inter alia, for the establishment of an employer-local union grievance committee which hears all grievances of owner-operators except (as provided in sec. 61) those relating to the rates of leases and compensation of the owner-operators under article 61. To review and adjust employer complaints on the wage rates and practices, because of competitive problems relating to owner-operators, a "Competitive Review Board" is established for that purpose under article 61, section 7.

At the hearing, Respondent amended its answer to admit that (1) on or about January 25, 1980, Respondent and the Union entered into the NMFA (G.C. Exh. 3) effective for the period April 1, 1979, through March 31, 1982; (2) the employees covered in the multiemployer bargaining unit set forth in articles 2 and 3 of the NMFA, including employees of Respondent, constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act; (3) Local 800 and affiliated local unions of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters have been the designated as exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the multiemployer unit, and have been recognized as such representative by Respondent for its employees pursuant to successive collective-bargaining agreements; and (4) at all material times, the Union by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act has been and is the exclusive representative of the employees in the multiemployer unit for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment.

As above noted, a strike among Respondent's and the industry employees started about August 22, 1979, after the expiration of the NMFA, March 31, 1979, and ended on or about January 20, 1980.

B. Contract Execution of January 25, 1980

On January 25, 1980, Respondent, as an individual employer, met with the Union at a motel in Greentree, Pennsylvania, for the purpose of negotiating and executing a successor collective-bargaining agreement for that which had expired on March 31, 1979. Present were Richard Wallace (General Counsel's sole witness; no other witness was called in support of the complaint) a business representative of Local 800 for 3 years and responsible for representation of the owner-operators at Respondent's two terminals; Robert Flynn, assistant to the director of the Eastern Conference of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters; Joseph Mazza, Steel Division Teamsters representative; Jerry Shulteis, an assistant to Flynn, present to take notes at the collective-bargaining session;[3] Ray Slogan and Bill Barber, steward and business representative, respectively, of Teamsters Local 249; and, for Respondent, John DeBolt and Stanley Wilmot, president and general manager, respectively, and Thomas MacMullan, attorney for Respondent.

It is undisputed that Respondent was meeting financial hardship in the operation of its business. At this meeting, DeBolt and attorney McMullan, demanded any and all forms of economic relief which were enjoyed by any other employer subject to the NMFA. DeBolt credibly testified that he told Flynn that he could not sign the "Red Book" because to do so would be to commit economic suicide; that it was futile to sign it because Respondent could not live under its terms. Wallace testified only that he could not recall DeBolt saying this. I credit DeBolt. Wallace was sitting 12 feet away from DeBolt and Flynn who faced each other across the table. Wallace recalled that DeBolt and McMullan mentioned that in respect to another employer, Spector Industries, they were entitled to cancel the lease arrangements with their owner-operators, and Respondent wanted that right; that Flynn told them that if Respondent wanted that relief it must abide by article 61, section 7, which would place the matter before the Competitive Review Board; and that Flynn said that Respondent could not get relief on an overall basis but that each of his claims would have to be reviewed. MacMullan insisted that he wanted the relief accorded to all carriers but Flynn insisted that he must use contract procedures and get relief from the Eastern Conference. In particular, Wallace recalls that Flynn made the same statement with regard to Respondent's demand for the right of trailer leasing cancellations.

[2] I have maintained the identification of documents made at the hearing: thus the "Red Book," which is the current NMFA which binds Respondent. (G.C. Exh. 3.)

[3] Neither Shulteis nor the presumptively corroborative notes were produced, nor were there any other Teamsters witnesses to this bargaining session whose testimony might be deemed favorable to General Counsel's case. Cf. District 65, Distributive Workers of America (Hartz Mountain Corporation), 593 F.2d 1155, fn. 21 (D.C. Cir. 1978).

Wallace testified that the Union told Respondent with regard to the cancellation of the trailer lease in the Spector case, that such a cancellation was an individualized case, and that Flynn said that, as in the Spector case, Respondent must utilize contract procedures to get relief from its trailer leases. In particular, Wallace denied that the Spector case was thrown in by the Union as an inducement for the Company to execute the contract.

There is no dispute that Respondent demanded, in the alternative, that it receive the benefit of the "Lakeshore Rider,"[4] and that the Union refused Respondent's request.

DeBolt's subsequent testimony contradicts Wallace's. Debolt testified that he then regarded the parties at impasse after the Lakeshore Rider was refused but told Flynn that, to sign the contract, he needed economic relief. According to DeBolt, Flynn then told him that the contract itself permits relief; that Respondent had the right under the existing contract (G.C. Exh. 3) to cancel the truck (trailer) leases and that the owner-operators would have to "pull company trailers."[5] Flynn, according to DeBolt, then asked whether this would help him out. DeBolt said that he asked Flynn whether Flynn was "sure" that Respondent had the right to cancel the trailer leases. Flynn said that they did; that it had been done successfully with another company and had been upheld by the Central States Teamsters Conference. DeBolt said that he then asked Flynn whether that would be effective with regard to him in their eastern states conference area. Flynn, according to DeBolt, said that since it was okay in the central states, there would be no doubt that it would be okay in the eastern conference area. With that assurance, DeBolt testified that he then signed the contract on behalf of Respondent and that was the only reason he signed.

While DeBolt agrees that there was a discussion between him and Flynn with regard to the presentation of matters before the competitive review board, DeBolt said that this had to do only with regard to Respondent's request for other economic relief such as reduction in the pension and health and welfare contributions. With regard to these other requests for relief, Flynn, according to DeBolt, said that there would be no general right to a reduction in these rates but that these requests for economic relief, i.e., changes in contract rates, would have to be submitted on an individual basis before the competitive review board.

After he signed the "Red Book," DeBolt testified that he was still "wary" of Flynn's assurance that Respondent had the right to cancel the trailer leases. He said that when this January 25, 1980, meeting ended, he asked Flynn to put in writing what the Union had agreed to at the meeting with regard to Respondent's right to cancel the trailer leases. Flynn agreed to do so as soon as he got back to Washington, D.C.[6] Respondent canceled the leases on the next working day, Monday, January 28.

On Monday, January 28, 1980, Respondent, by its general manager, Stanley Wilmot, sent certified mail letters (G.C. Exhs. 5(a)-5(f)) to each of the six owner-operators to the following effect:

> You are hereby notified that any and all lease agreement(s) between yourself and DeBolt Transfer, Inc., will be cancelled and become null and void as at 12:00 p.m. (midnight) Sunday, February 3, 1980, in accordance with the five (5) day notification provision contained in paragraph (1) of said lease(s).
> Please arrange to sign and obtain a new lease from this office which will become effective 12:01 a.m., Monday, February 4, 1980 for future use.
>
> Very truly yours,
> DeBolt Transfer, Inc.[7]

By letter (Resp. Exh. 1) dated January 29, 1980, Flynn wrote to Respondent as follows:

> Please be advised that equipment leases may be cancelled in accordance with the collective-bargaining agreement. As an example, you have the right to add Company equipment provided that there is

[4] The ordinary method of compensation under Respondent's leases of owner-operator trailers and tractors was to pay 75 percent of the gross revenues as compensation for such leases, retaining 25 percent for itself out of which it paid the drivers' health and welfare, pension, and other fringe benefits. It is undisputed that such a ratio sometimes resulted in Respondent losing money because the retained 25 percent was exhausted by fringe benefits and other direct costs. The "Lakeshore Rider" while permitting Lakeshore to retain only 20 percent of the gross revenues, granting the driver 80 percent of the gross revenues, but required the employee to pay his own fringe benefits out of his 80-percent compensation.

[5] Again, the only limitation on cancellation is in art. 55, sec. 18: to prevent cancellation where the purpose is to deprive the owner-operator of employment. Since complaints regarding the employer's cancellation are heard, under that section, pursuant to the grievance procedure, the terms themselves assume a right of cancellation in the employer subject only to subsequent grievance. Nothing therein suggests an obligation to bargain before canceling.

[6] January 25, 1980, the day of execution of the present NMFA, fell on a Friday.

[7] These letters were sent to owner-operators William Leach, Ralph Johnson, Carlo DeSimone, Elmer Bates, Thomas Bates, Eugene McLamore. The complaint alleges that these six owner-operators (as a result of Respondent's unilateral action in canceling their leases) were thereafter unlawfully not scheduled for work upon their failure to execute new leases, in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act.

no subterfuge to avoid the labor contract or to discriminate against the employees.

Article 22, Sections 5 and 6 both refer to the minimum 30-day cancellation clause for lease equipment. Article 55, Sections 5 and 6 also make reference to the minimum 30-day lease. Further, Section 15 provides for negotiation and arbitration of any disputes in this regard. Of course, Sections 16 through 20 of Article 55 are aimed at preventing subterfuges and violations of the agreement. Your attention is also directed to Article 43 (Seniority).

I trust that the above explanation in reference to the contract is satisfactory to you.

Sincerely,
s/s Robert T. Flynn

Lastly, DeBolt testified, with respect to his execution of the collective-bargaining agreement on January 25, that at the time of actually signing it, he told Flynn that, "I am only signing this 'Red Book' on your assurance that I have the right to cancel the truck leases." DeBolt testified that Flynn answered, "You have the right." DeBolt said that nothing was said regarding submission of these cancellations to the competitive review board or any other body. Thereafter, DeBolt said that Respondent was going to cancel the truck leases at its first opportunity and that someone the Respondent said, "Do what you want." Thereafter, after execution of the contract, DeBolt said that he spoke to Wallace and told him, "Your guys are not going to like this at all." DeBolt said that Wallace answered, "That's tough." DeBolt said that he rejoined, "If it is okay with you, it's okay with me." This testimony was received without objection and Wallace was not recalled to deny this testimony.

Wallace testified that although trailer leasing cancellation was mentioned, Flynn repeatedly stated that Respondent would have to go through contract procedures in order to gain such relief. He testified that at least two employers, J. F. Scott and CRST Company, had received relief although the relief did not relate to the leasing of equipment but rather to rates of pay, pension and health and welfare contributions.[8] One of them, CRST Company, was not a signer of the "Red Book"; with regard to the other, J. F. Scott, it was a "Red Book" signer, but the economic relief did not relate to the leasing of the equipment. Wallace, as above noted, did not testify with regard to DeBolt's testimony wherein, after the contract was signed, DeBolt told him that Respondent's employees would not like the lease cancellations and Wallace allegedly replied: "That's tough."

Wallace further testified that after the meeting on January 25, within 3 to 4 days, he received telephone calls from owner-operators inquiring why the trailer leases had been canceled. Wallace testified that he told them that he did not know but would find out. In subsequent telephone calls to Respondent from Wallace, he finally reached General Manager Wilmot who told him that Respondent felt that by virtue of the negotiations, Respondent was correct in canceling the truck leases. Without contradiction, Wallace testified that he told Wilmot that it was wrong to do so; was a definite breach of contract; that in order to cancel the leases Respondent had to go through the contract procedures to get relief; and that in two other trucking operations in which Respondent had an interest, Respondent had not terminated the trailer leases; and that Wallace believed that in doing so with regard to the two terminals in which the Union represented the owner-operators, Respondent was attempting to eliminate owner-operators at these two terminals and was using the trailer lease cancellations as a subterfuge to do so in violation of the contract.[9]

1. The two meetings between Wallace and Wilmot

Sometime in or about mid-February 1980, Wilmot and Wallace met at a restaurant in Pittsburgh wherein Wilmot repeated the request for economic relief and stated that Respondent wanted the Lakeshore Rider if the matter was to get off dead center concerning the cancellation of the leases. Wallace told him that the Lakeshore Rider provision was going to be withdrawn and could not be granted to Respondent. Wilmot placed this meeting as early March 1980. For purposes of this proceeding, the date placed by Wallace (he was unsure of the date) as some 2 weeks after receiving the first phone call would place the meeting sometime in mid or late February. The next meeting was held on April 1, 1980, notwithstanding Wallace's contrary recollection that it was held 2 weeks before April 1. It was held at the Howard Johnson's restaurant in Monroeville, Pennsylvania.

In any event, it would appear probable that this second meeting between Wilmot and Wallace (at which Wallace was accompanied by three owner-operator employees of Respondent) occurred after a letter (G.C. Exh. 6) from Flynn to DeBolt, dated March 7, 1980:

> I have been advised by the three Local Unions that you are blatantly violating the collective-bargaining agreement. [Your] conduct is not only a violation of the contract but is an unfair labor practice. Under the circumstances, the Local Unions reserve the right to take appropriate legal and economic action in protest of your unfair labor practices.

You have abused the em-

[8] This corroborates DeBolt's testimony concerning the matters on which Flynn insisted the competitive review board procedures were required, i.e., changes in contract rates, whether wages or fringe benefits.

[9] The General Counsel conceded that the operations at other trucking terminals in which Respondent had an interest where those operations included the use of owner-operators and the leasing of tractors and trailers had no bearing on the instant case. Further, Respondent's lease cancellations in this case related only to trailers. It did not eliminate owner-operators and sought to maintain the truck leases.

Copies of this letter to Respondent were sent to Locals 249, 261, and 800, as well as to Thomas D. MacMullan, attorney for Respondent. The letter, itself, fails to deny the substance of the alleged agreement regarding lease cancellations at the January 25, 1980, meeting. At the April 1, 1980, meeting, Wallace accused Respondent of canceling the leases to the owner-operators (in view of not canceling owner-operators leases at other terminals in which Respondent had an interest) to eliminate owner-operators at two of Respondent's terminals and to break the Union at DeBolt Transfer Company. Wilmot denied this. Elmer Bates and the other owner-operators said that they could not afford to pull company trailers, that they were not going to pull company trailers and questioned why other owner-operators at these other "divisions" at which Respondent had an interest were allowed to do it and they were not. When the owner-operators asked whether something could be worked out other than the cancellation of their trailer leases, Wilmot said that there was no alternative that he could think of. Elmer Bates then asked whether a Lakeshore Rider arrangement could be provided and asked Wilmot why that could not solve the problem. Wilmot replied that it was up to the Union and not to Respondent. Wallace then said that he was taking the matter to the National Labor Relations Board.

It is undisputed that DeBolt never filed a request for relief under contract procedures. It was also conceded that other independent carriers (not members of any multiemployer bargaining group) like DeBolt had filed requests for relief and some of them have been granted. Respondent's witnesses testified that, pursuant to the January 25 meeting, they did not file for relief under the contract procedures because they believed that they had an agreement with the Union making such request for relief unnecessary in terms of their alleged right to cancel the trailer leases unilaterally.

On the other hand, Wallace testified that the Union did not file a grievance under the contract because of Respondent's alleged breach of contract (in the unilateral act of canceling the leases) because the Union already had three to four grievances on file against Respondent; and because the Union considered the filing of grievances a waste of time since Respondent has refused to abide by agreements settling the grievances. Wilmot, on the contrary, testified that on January 29, 1980, the parties settled five to six grievances which were all the outstanding grievances at that time; that there had been no complaints from the Union regarding the settlement of these grievances; and that there had been no allegation that Respondent has been dragging its feet in executing the agreed-upon solutions to the grievances. Indeed, according to Wilmot, there had been no union request for further action under contract procedures notwithstanding that the Union has been conducting an audit of Respondent's overall compliance with contributions to the various fringe benefit funds. Wilmot testified without contradiction, however, that this audit was not the result of any filed grievance by Local 800. Respondent notes that no grievance had been filed over lease cancellation by any of the owner-operators.

The leases in question herein, according to the agreement of the parties, relate to tractors and trailers separately. As above noted, the practice is for Respondent to lease both a tractor and a trailer from the owner-operator. It is agreed that the lease provides for a lease term of 30 days, cancelable by either party, however, on a 5-day written notice.

The parties agreed that in practice, from time to time, owner-operators have canceled tractor and/or trailer leases on a 5-day notice for economic reasons, equipment failures and other reasons not particularly specified in the record; and that Respondent's January 28, 1980, letters of lease cancellation, although phrased in terms of canceling "all lease agreements" were directed solely at the cancellation of the trailer leases. Indeed, the parties agree that it was the Respondent's intent to have the owner-operators use their own leased tractors to haul trailers which were owned by Respondent.[10] The parties further agree that the cancellations themselves were in accordance with the terms of the leases and that motivation for the cancellation of the leases was solely economic and was due to the fact that Respondent could not afford the terms imposed by the collective-bargaining agreement (G.C. Exh. 3) regarding the cost of leasing trailers; and that it was cheaper for Respondent to operate by having the owner-operators haul company trailers rather than leased trailers.

As a result of the above cancellations, none of the six owner-operators at Respondent's two terminals has executed or agreed to execute a new lease for his tractor and none of them has therefore been scheduled to haul merchandise for Respondent since the cancellation. The result is that none of them have therefore worked for Respondent since the lease cancellations.

2. Contention of the parties

The General Counsel argues that under Local 24, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO, et al. v. Oliver, et al., 358 U.S. 283 (1959), the wage rates involved in owner-operator leases are a mandatory subject of bargaining within the meaning of Sections 8(d) and 8(a)(5) of the Act; that there was an existing collective-bargaining agreement executed by Respondent and Local 800 (G.C. Exh. 3); that while individual cancellation of a lease may be a mere contract violation and not a violation of Section 8(a)(5), where, as here, there has been a change in the methods of payment (a mandatory subject) on a unitwide basis, a "blanket unilateral cancellation of trailer leases," there is an 8(a)(5) and 8(d) violation. Further, the General Counsel notes that Respondent took this unilateral action notwithstanding the existence of a contract mechanism (the General Counsel cites art. 2, sec. 5 or art. 61, sec. 7) to place its desired economic relief before the competitive review board by way of a grievance system.

[10] Thus, the leased tractors would thereafter haul Respondent's trailers, not leased trailers.

Respondent has three arguments: (1) A contract waiver derived from the fact that the lease agreement itself permits, and the parties had in practice applied, cancellation on a 5-day notice which Respondent in fact gave; and therefore, the parties, including the Union (through its owner-operators and the lease) have agreed under the terms of the contract and the lease, and by practice, to the very procedure which Respondent followed in canceling all the owner-operator leases; and there is no difference between canceling one lease and all the leases especially where, as here, the contract provides for (and specifically defines the limits of) lease cancellation by Respondent, and where there has been no proof of subterfuge, and indeed where there has been a stipulation that Respondent's motivation has been solely economic. (2) Moreover, by virtue of the January 25, 1980, meeting, even if the collective-bargaining agreement and the lease do not provide express written waivers, then, in any case, Respondent notified, bargained, and received express consent of the Union to waive any contrary right in the Union not to grant Respondent the right to unilaterally cancel the trailer leases. (3) In any event, Respondent's conduct does not amount to an unfair labor practice but merely a breach of contract for which the Union's relief should be solely in the Federal courts under Section 301 of the Act for breach of contract or for arbitration under the terms of the agreement within the Collyer deferral doctrine. See Collyer Insulated Wire, A Gulf and Western Systems Co., 192 NLRB 837 (1971).

3. Discussion and conclusions

The parties stipulated that Respondent's motivation in canceling the six leases was wholly economic.

I will assume, arguendo, that lease cancellation and lease rates, as part of, or impacting on, wages, Teamsters v. Oliver, 358 U.S. 283, are mandatory subjects of bargaining, N.L.R.B. v. Wooster Division of Borg-Warner Corporation, 356 U.S. 342, 349-350 (1958).[11]

There is nothing, however, in Teamsters v. Oliver, supra, Wooster Division of Borg-Warner, supra, or the General Counsel's citation of Brown & Connolly, Inc., 237 NLRB 271, 279 (1978), which controls this case.

While it is true that the bargaining on January 25, 1980, related to Respondent's several requests for economic relief, and while it is also true that the Union may have refused any change in owner-operator lease or pay rates, including the Lakeshore Rider, except via a special showing of economic need made before the competitive review board (art. 61, sec. 7) to change the contract rates, there is nothing in the current collective-bargaining agreement, which, inter alia, provides for 30-day leases and their cancellation (G.C. Exh. 3) to prohibit Respondent from unilaterally terminating the leases.

The dispositive element in this case is that Respondent, after being refused any adjustment or rate reduction on leased equipment, unilaterally canceled the underlying leases. There is no General Counsel contention that Respondent failed to abide by the notice, or other mechanical requirements of lease cancellation. Rather, the General Counsel argues that the cancellation of the leases themselves, while not a change in pay rates, results in a severe impact on owner-operator "wages" and that cancellation requires good-faith bargaining and not unilateral change. I disagree.

The contract (art. 22, sec. 5; art. 55, sec. 6) provides for and recognizes the use and termination of leased equipment with a 30-day cancellation clause.[12] The basic contract limitation on the use of owner-operators is the prohibition (art. 22, sec. 18) against using any device or "scheme" to ". . . defeat the terms of the Agreement . . . nor shall any owner-operator lease be cancelled for the purpose of depriving employees of employment . . . ." The parties herein stipulated to the contrary: that cancellation of the leases was purely economically motivated. There was no argument or even assertion that Respondent's action here would deprive the owner-operators of employment. At most, the drivers would haul company trailers behind trucks which continued subject to their beneficial leases. In any event, Respondent's leases cancellation can hardly be called a "scheme." More important, the terms of article 55, section 18, as above noted, forbid that a "lease be cancelled for the purpose of depriving employees of employment . . . ." and directs complaints thereof to the agreement's grievance procedure (art. 44). It is thus plain from this language that, whatever the Employer's motive, the effect of the cancellation or the Union's redress, the Employer has the right of cancellation. The grievance procedure is here invoked after cancellation. Thus the employer does the canceling and there is no bargaining as a condition precedent to canceling.

I therefore hold that, regardless of any January 25, 1980, agreement at the bargaining table or Flynn's January 29, 1980, confirmatory letter to DeBolt, Respondent had the right, here, unilaterally, to cancel the trailer leases (keeping the truck leases); that Respondent did not in any way change or attempt to change the contract lease rates thereby;[13] that the terms of the lease and its cancellation, if impacting on wages or other terms and conditions of employment within Section 8(d) of the Act, were matters already agreed on by the parties; and that

[11] In view of the allegation that Respondent's conduct, in failing to schedule for work the owner-operators whose lease were canceled, whatever Respondent's benign motivation, violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act, I reject Respondent's argument that the matter be deferred to arbitration under the collective-bargaining agreement pursuant to Collyer Insulated Wire, supra. See General American Transportation Corporation, 228 NLRB 808 (1977).

[12] There is no contention that the automatic 30-day renewal clause in Respondent's lease (G.C. Exh. 2) cancelable on merely 5 days' notice was inconsistent with the collective-bargaining agreement. If so, Respondent's lease form was a breach of that agreement. In any event, the matter was neither alleged, litigated, or argued. My right to interpret the terms of the agreement is limited, of course, to the presence or absence of an unfair labor practice. N.L.R.B. v. C & C Plywood Corporation, 385 U.S. 421, 428 (1967).

[13] There is no dispute that the "Red Book," the collective-bargaining agreement, requires the employer to pay 75 percent of the gross freight invoice as owner-operator wages and, of the retained 25 percent, pay the driver's health, welfare, and pension benefits.

Respondent's January 28 cancellation of the six leases herein was in accord with the Red Book where, as here, there is no assertion of an attempt to change the lease rates (clearly a matter for the competitive review board), a discriminatory purpose in the cancellations or an attempt at some sort of subterfuge.

The General Counsel's principal argument seems to derive from dictum in Brown & Connolly Inc., supra, 237 NLRB 271, 279, wherein it was asserted that while a unilateral, individual change from contract requirements in an employer's sick leave obligation is a mere breach contract, a mass unitwide unilateral change in the sick leave obligation would violate Section 8(a)(5). In the present case, Respondent is not unilaterally changing a contract term or the terms (rates) of the leasing; it is merely canceling the lease because of economic reasons; a contingency expressly provided for in the contract. The General Counsel, again, does not urge that the lease was inconsistent with contract provisions or cancelled other than under its terms. In the Brown & Connolly, dictum, the contract terms under which sick leave could be taken were at issue; here, Respondent was unilaterally terminating an agreement sponsored by and consistent with the collective agreement, but not changing any contract term. The contract, of course, does not require notice or bargaining on lease cancellation; it merely provides a minimum cancellation period. The fact that such cancellation has an impact on the owner-operator's income may be true. But that was part of the existing bargain agreed to by the Union.

Nothing in Local 24, Teamsters Union v. Oliver, supra, 358 U.S. 283, is to the contrary. As above, assuming, arguendo, that that case implies that the instant lease is a mandatory subject of bargaining, N.L.R.B. v. Wooster Division of Borg-Warner Corporation, the matter has been thoroughly bargained about and the fruit of such bargaining is the actual lease (G.C. Exh. 2). Thus, the result of the actual bargain permits Respondent to act under the terms of the lease which, I have noted, is not alleged to be inconsistent with the underlying collective-bargaining agreement, either by lease terms or motivation in the cancellation.

If, as the General Counsel urges (Br. p. 6):

> . . . the cancellation of trailer leases becomes a mandatory subject of bargaining under Oliver because the lease cancellation necessarily affects the amount of compensation received by the owner-operators . . . .

That result was bargained out by the parties by virtue of the Union recognizing—indeed, providing, in the contract for—the termination of the lease. Moreover, the evidence, undenied, shows that the actual practice is for either party to cancel the 30-day lease on a 5-day notice. To imply a lease cancellation bargaining obligation on Respondent[14] would be to change the bargain struck by the parties.

In any event, while the credibility issue legally thus need not be reached, yet in view of the evidence that Wallace, 10 feet from DeBolt and Flynn, may not have heard their entire conversation; the Union's failure to submit other witnesses to the January 25 bargaining session to support Wallace's testimony, especially the absence of Flynn and his notetaker; Wallace's failure to be called in rebuttal to deny DeBolt's testimony regarding a conversation with Wallace himself (" . . . your guys are not going to like this at all . . ." to which Wallace allegedly responded: "That's tough"); the presence of Flynn's unexplained January 29, 1980, letter which is consistent with DeBolt's testimony (that Flynn gave him permission to cancel the leases), I would credit DeBolt and discredit Wallace's contrary testimony regarding what Flynn authorized to DeBolt at the January 25 bargaining session.[15] I conclude, therefore, that Flynn, in the alternative, waived any union objection to unilateral cancellation.

It is recommended, therefore, that the complaint allegations of 8(a)(5) violations be dismissed.[16] Similarly, the refusal of Respondent to schedule for work the six owner-operators who refused to haul Respondent's trailers derives from neither an unlawful cancellation of their trailer leases nor any other alleged or proven discriminatory motive. It is their own refusal to haul company trailers that causes their idleness. I further recommend that the allegations alleging Respondent's discriminatory failure under Section 8(a)(3) of the Act to schedule the owner-operators be dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. DeBolt Transfer Company, Respondent herein, is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. A preponderance of the credible evidence fails to establish that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) or (3) of the Act, as alleged.

[14] Query: If such an obligation devolves on Respondent here, would its owner-operators, contrary to current practice and mutual understanding, be barred hereafter from unilaterally canceling their leases with Respondent, even under the terms thereof, if Respondent objects, only if the Union first bargains to impasse with Respondent and then submits to the competitive review board (which apparently deals only with hardship rates under art. 61) or, more appropriately, the grievance committee under art. 44, 45?

[15] Since Respondent's lease cancellation is not inconsistent with the collective-bargaining agreement, there is no question of prohibiting recourse to DeBolt's and Flynn's testimony under the parole evidence rule. Even if it were inconsistent, however, I observe that Flynn's January 29, 1980, letter, written after the execution of the January 25 collective-bargaining agreement removes the bargaining conversations from the operation of the rule; and cf. Richmond Homes, Inc., 245 NLRB 1205 (1979).

[16] Again, if Respondent sought to change contract rates of leased equipment, then, as the General Counsel argues, Respondent must come before the competitive review board (art. 6, sec. 7) to plead special circumstances. Here, since I hold the lease cancellation has been bargained over, resulting in a contract-approved lease and cancellation, the fact that cancellation has an impact on and adversely affects owner-operator wages (G.C. Br., p. 6) is a risk bargained over and resolved by the owner-operators' collective-bargaining representative. The economic result, foreseen in the collective-bargaining agreement, including unilateral risks of termination, must be borne by the parties.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

It is recommended that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

[17] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JULIUS COHN, Administrative Law Judge: On January 29, 1981, I issued my Decision in this proceeding finding, inter alia, that Flores Demetrio Gonzalez had been unlawfully discharged in January 1977 and had been further unlawfully reinstated in May 1977 to a position different from that which he had formerly held.

In May 1978, Respondent again discharged Gonzalez for allegedly refusing to obey the orders of head houseman, Augusto Feo, and threatening to kill him. After hearing evidence on the issue raised by Respondent that Gonzalez was not entitled to reinstatement after May 1978 because he had been discharged for cause, I found that discharge to be presumptively valid since it had not been alleged as a violation herein nor had a new charge been filed. Therefore, backpay and reinstatement were cut off as of the date of May 1978 discharge.

On June 15, 1981, the Board issued its Decision and Order (256 NLRB 561) affirming both the unlawful discharge of Gonzalez in January 1977 and improper reinstatement in May 1977, but it did not agree with the disposition of the case with regard to Gonzalez' right to reinstatement and further backpay. Therefore, the Board, having noted that the matter had been fully litigated, remanded the proceeding to me "for the limited purpose of making credibility findings with respect to the May 1978 incidents and recommendations as to whether, under all of the circumstances, the conduct engaged in by Gonzalez was such as to require the forfeiture of his right to reinstatement and backpay after May 1978."

[2] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

Upon the entire record and from my observation of the witnesses, I make the following:

Additional Findings of Fact and Conclusions

At the hearing Stephan Delmont, operations manager of Respondent, testified that Augusto Feo was appointed as head houseman sometime after the discharge of Gonzalez on January 17, 1977, and prior to Gonzalez's reinstatement in May 1977. He further stated that Gonzalez was dicharged in May 1978 for threatening the life of his "supervisor," Augusto Feo.[1]

Gonzalez testified that, on the date of his discharge in May 1978, he was on the 15th floor fixing and cleaning a room. Feo came in and gave him orders, telling him what he had to do and how he was to do it. Gonzalez asked Feo, "To do me the favor and leave me alone because I was already a year doing the work and I knew what I was doing . . . ." Feo then went downstairs and was directed by the housekeeper to get a man from another floor and bring him up to the floor where Gonzalez was working. He then told Gonzalez, in effect, that the other man was cleaning the room that he, Gonzalez, was supposed to clean. At that moment Gonzalez threatened him. Feo said Gonzalez offended his mother, and then said to let him alone, and if he did not, he would throw him out the window. Feo then reported this to his superiors and, as a result, told Gonzalez when he was going home that he was suspended from the job. Upon being asked whether he recalled anything else that happened in the room, Feo said that, when he was talking to Gonzalez, the latter tried to take a chair and lift it in his hand. At that, Feo said he left the room.

In evaluating the testimony as to this incident, it must be borne in mind that I have already credited the testimony of Gonzalez as to the other matters involved herein. On the other hand, Delmont's testimony is not probative because concededly he was merely repeating what Feo allegedly told him as to a threat on his life. Feo himself testified mainly in response to leading questions concerning the principal matter at issue. And, noting that Respondent has the burden of establishing that Gonzalez engaged in conduct which would foreclose his right to reinstatement, I find that Respondent has not sustained it by virtue of the uncorroborated testimony of Feo. In any event I credit Gonzalez to the effect that he did not threaten the life of Feo.

Having found that Gonzalez did not threaten the life of Feo, the head houseman, there remains, at most, an alleged failure on the part of Gonzalez to respond to an instruction to clean some rooms other than those in which he was currently working. The Board has already found that Gonzalez was entitled to reinstatement to the job he held previous to his initial discharge in January 1977 with backpay. His failure to respond immediately to an instruction of the sort alleged does not appear serious enough to warrant the loss of his right to reinstatement, established by reason of Respondent's unfair labor practices. In arriving at this determination, I have considered that Respondent had reinstated him to a lesser job than that to which he was entitled and had indeed given it to Feo. In addition, Respondent exhibited a continuing animus toward Gonzalez evidenced by the finding in my Decision that, sometime after the improper reinstatement, Delmont informed him he had done him a favor by giving him a job and, if he continued his protests about working conditions to other employees, he would be discharged. Moreover, it may also be observed that, had Respondent reinstated Gonzalez to his former position as head houseman, to which he had been entitled, he would never have had the difficulties which led to his discharge in May 1978.[2] Finally, even assuming that Gonzalez had uttered the words attributed to him by Feo, the conduct would not call for discharge in view of the antagonistic environment and provocative position in which he was placed,[3] particularly since epithets and the like do not constitute real threats in the everyday parlance of employees.

In conclusion, based on my credibility resolution regarding the Feo incident and in view of all the circumstances, I find that Gonzalez should not have been deprived of his continuing right to reinstatement and backpay after May 1978. Accordingly, I recommend that paragraph 2(a) of my recommended Order adopted by the Board be amended to read as follows:[4]

"(a) Offer Flores Demetrio Gonzalez immediate and full reinstatement to the position he held prior to his discharge in January 1977 or, if such job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and make him whole for any loss of earnings in the manner set forth in the section of the Decision entitled 'The Remedy,' including the period after May 1978."

I further recommend that the last paragraph of the notice attached to the Board's Order be amended to read as follows:

"WE WILL offer full reinstatement to Flores Demetrio Gonzalez and make him whole for any losses he may have sustained by reason of the discrimination practiced against him, plus interest."

---

[1] The same finding made in fn. 2 of my Decision with respect to the supervisory status of Gonzalez is repeated here. There is insufficient evidence in the record that Feo, as in the case of Gonzalez, was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On March 27, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Burton Litvack issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge as modified herein and to adopt his recommended Order.

We agree with the Administrative Law Judge that, at the time of the October 16 meeting between Michael Draper, representative of Respondent Carpenters, and Jerome Rubin, attorney for Alaska Lumber and Pulp Company (ALP), Rubin was not an agent of Phost Construction, Inc., the Charging Party. More importantly, we think that the same circumstances that indicate lack of agency status also demonstrate that Draper's threat to picket was aimed at ALP, not at Phost.

In addition to the persuasive evidence with regard to agency cited by the Administrative Law Judge, we rely on the following facts. At the July 21 meeting where Rubin presented a proposed contract between Respondent and Phost, he did so in the presence of a Phost officer. When Respondent presented its counterproposal to Rubin on August 21, it does not appear that any negotiations occurred; rather, Rubin simply agreed to transmit the proposal to Phost. After that, there were apparently no further negotiations between Respondent and Phost, through Rubin or otherwise. Rather, Phost entered into a collective-bargaining agreement with another union. Draper testified that, at the meeting of October 16, he "assumed" that Rubin represented Phost as well as ALP, but it does not appear that Draper said so at the meeting. Moreover, his assumption should have been dispelled when Rubin was unable to answer questions on Phost's behalf. By Rubin's own testimony and that of Kurt Sachnitz, an officer of ALP, Rubin said only that he had heard "rumors" that Phost had signed an agreement with the Paperworkers and, when Draper asked if they had agreed to $21 an hour, Rubin said, "Not to my knowledge."

Even if Draper thought that Rubin continued to represent Phost in certain matters, it does not follow that he intended to threaten Phost on October 16. Rubin's principal role was as attorney for ALP, and Draper had dealt with him in the past in that capacity. The main focus of the negotiations, and especially of the October 16 meeting, was the proposed contract between Respondent and ALP. Draper's threat to picket was calculated to apply economic pressure on ALP—the only party that could meet Draper's demand—and in these circumstances we conclude that Draper was communicating that threat to ALP through its representative, Rubin. We therefore conclude that Draper's threat did not have as an object that Phost cease doing business with ALP, and thus we find that the General Counsel has failed to show that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

BURTON LITVAK, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me in Seattle, Washington, on December 18, 1980, based upon a charge filed by Phost Construction, Inc., herein called Phost, on October 27, 1980, and a complaint and notice of hearing, which was issued by the Regional Director for Region 19 of the National Labor Relations Board, herein called the Board, on November 28, 1980. The complaint, in substance, alleges that agents of Local Union No. 2362, Lumber, Production and Industrial Workers, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO, herein called Respondent, engaged in acts and conduct violative of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, herein called the Act, by threatening a common representative of Alaska Lumber and Pulp Co., Inc., herein called ALP, and Phost that it would picket a Phost construction site in an attempt to shut down construction work, with objects thereof to force Phost and other persons engaged in commerce to cease doing business with ALP; or to force ALP to recognize or bargain with Respondent. Respondent filed an answer which, in substance, denied that it engaged in any conduct violative of the Act. At the hearing the General Counsel, the Charging Party (Phost), and Respondent were represented by counsel and were afforded full opportunity to present oral and written evidence and argument and to examine and cross-examine witnesses. Post-trial briefs have been filed on behalf of all parties and have been carefully considered. Upon the entire record, careful observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and post-hearing briefs, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The parties stipulated that Phost is an Alaska corporation, with an office and place of business near Wrangell, Alaska, where it is engaged in the business of constructing a sawmill, and that during the past 12-month period immediately preceding issuance of the complaint, which period is representative, in the course and conduct of its business operations, Phost provided services valued in excess of $50,000 to customers within the State of Alaska, which customers were engaged in interstate commerce by other than indirect means. Accordingly, Respondent admits, and I find, that Phost is now, and has been at all times material herein, an employer and person engaged in commerce and in industries affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that at all times material herein, it has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

A. Issue

Did Respondent engage in acts and conduct violative of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act by, on or about October 16, 1980,[1] through its agent Michael Draper, threatening a representative of both ALP and Phost that it would picket a Phost construction site in an attempt to shut down construction work, with objects thereof to force Phost and other persons to cease doing business with ALP; or to force or require ALP to recognize and bargain with Respondent?

B. Facts

ALP is a subsidiary of Alaska Pulp America, Inc., and is engaged in the production of dissolving pulp and lumber in the State of Alaska, with its products shipped primarily to Japan. In furtherance of its operations ALP maintains a dissolving pulp plant in Sitka and, until April 1, utilized two sawmills in a small town called Wrangell which is located on remote Wrangell Island. Regarding the two sawmills, one is located inside the town and employs approximately 65 to 70 workers who are represented for purposes of collective bargaining by a local of the United Paperworkers International Union, herein called the UPIU. The downtown sawmill, herein called the Wrangell mill, is used by ALP primarily for the cutting of larger spruce logs. The other sawmill was located 6 miles outside Wrangell on the Zimovia Highway and was known as the 6-mile mill or AWP mill.[2] This sawmill employed approximately 50 to 55 persons, who were represented for purposes of collective bargaining by Respondent, and cut primarily "baby squares" or four-by-four lumber pieces.

James Rynearson, a senior vice president of ALP, testified that, due to expected environmental problems caused by the proposed Alaska Lands Bill which, by its terms, restricted the quality and quantity of timber available for cutting in certain areas of the State, the decision was made by ALP in 1977 to study the feasibility of constructing a new type of sawmill, which would use a lesser type and quality log and which would continue to permit ALP to be operational in Wrangell. As a result, the company officials concluded that this new mill should have the same production capacity as the two existing sawmills combined and that, inasmuch as the AWP site encompassed a greater physical area and as there was no room for expansion of the Wrangell mill, it should be constructed on the AWP millsite. Accordingly, Rynearson testified, in early 1980 with passage of the new legislation imminent, ALP decided to implement its aforementioned plans. Both Respondent and the UPIU were receptive to the proposed consolidation of operations, agreeing that such was essential if ALP was to remain competitive.

As an initial step, ALP commenced negotiations with Phost regarding the latter becoming the general contractor for the anticipated construction operations. While said discussions were ongoing, ALP commissioned engineering plans for the project and, in view of weather problems, concluded that construction work on the project had to commence no later than July 15. Therefore—and to apparently have sufficient time to prepare the site for said work, production operations at the AWP mill were "closed down" on April 1, and a portion of the work force was given jobs on a new second shift at the Wrangell mill.[3] Also at approximately the same time, pursuant to the terms of the existing collective-bargaining agreement between ALP and Respondent, which was due to expire on May 31, Respondent sent a letter requesting that ALP enter into negotiations on a successor contract. However, no such negotiations ensued.

The record establishes that ALP's construction plans at the AWP site entailed initially increasing the physical area of the entire facility, then demolishing the existing sawmill, and, finally, constructing a new and significantly larger mill building. Left standing and untouched by the construction work were to be a planer shed and sorting area in which the lumber is surfaced, a dock area, a powerhouse building, and a maintenance shed. As to the first aspect of ALP's construction plans—increasing the available physical area, ALP contracted with Berg Construction Company for a landfill operation which would extend the AWP area into Zimovia Strait. Said work commenced shortly after April 1 and was concluded prior to July. ALP's planning did not escape the notice of the Alaskan construction unions, and shortly after production ceased at the AWP mill in April, representatives of the Alaska Building Trades Council, which comprises those unions engaged in representing employees in the building and construction industry, approached ALP, stating that they understood a new mill was to be constructed at the AWP location and demanding jurisdiction over all the work. Negotiations began with the construction unions and lasted until early June, with ALP insisting that a portion of the work be nonunion to ensure that Wrangell residents, former ALP employees, would be able to work on the project. Finally, agreement was reached that 65 percent of the work, including the actual construction, electrical, landfill, and ducting work, would be performed by employees of union-signatory subcontractors and that 35 percent of the work, including demolition and machine installation work, could be nonunion. Moreover, this latter portion of the work was to be undertaken by Phost, and ALP and the unions reached a further understanding that, while the Phost employees were to be local Wrangell residents and presumably nonunion, it (ALP) would attempt to persuade Phost to negotiate a labor contract, covering said employees, to ensure labor peace on the jobsite.

[1] Unless otherwise stated herein, all dates are in 1980.

[2] ALP purchased the sawmill from another company, Alaska Wood Products, and apparently assumed the existing collective-bargaining agreement, covering the production and maintenance employees, with Respondent.

[3] Those employees who transferred to the Wrangell mill were required to become members of the UPIU.

Meanwhile, while engaging in the aforementioned negotiations, ALP was continuing construction contract discussions with Phost. According to ALP's attorney, Jerome L. Rubin, ALP officials notified Phost about the former's agreement with the Building Trades Council, and Phost consented to abide by it. More specifically, ALP requested that Phost negotiate a labor agreement, and Phost agreed to do so. Phost and ALP reached agreement on the construction contract in late June. Said agreement, which was not executed by the parties until October 22, provides that Phost supply all necessary labor, equipment, and services for completion of the project and perform all work in accordance with ALP's instructions.[4] As to the hiring of subcontractors, the agreement grants to ALP and Phost the right to do so; however, once on the project, subcontractors were to work under the direction of Phost. As to the work, Phost was to be responsible for the engineering work, demolition work, the installation of new machinery, and ensuring that the newly installed machinery was operational.[5]

Subsequent to the agreement between ALP and the Alaskan Building Trades Council and Phost's acceptance thereof, representatives of ALP, Phost, and Respondent met in Portland, Oregon, on July 21. There is some dispute as to which party requested the meeting—Rynearson testified that ALP called for the session, while Respondent's agent, Michael Draper, stated that Respondent requested the meeting to negotiate a new contract with ALP. In any event, Rubin and Rynearson represented ALP; Attorney Kenneth S. Klarquist represented Phost; and Draper and another official, Robert Westbrook, represented Respondent. While there is no dispute as to the subject matter discussed, there is a slight variance in the record as to what was specifically said at the meeting. According to Rynearson, Respondent, represented by Draper, demanded a 3-year collective-bargaining agreement with ALP to become effective immediately, while Rubin counteroffered to Respondent a 1-year agreement with Phost, covering the construction work. Specifically, Draper proposed a contract identical to the industrywide agreement. Rubin replied that "he thought [a 3-year contract] was highly illegal . . . when we had no production, no members working. . . ." Attorney Rubin corroborated Rynearson, adding that Draper said that a 3-year contract was essential to preserve a "contract bar" argument before the Board and that he could not deviate from such a contract term whatever the economics. Draper testified that two contract proposals were on the table—Rubin's proposal for a contract to cover the "remodernization of the sawmill," between Respondent and Phost, and Respondent's proposal for a new collective-bargaining agreement between ALP and Respondent. The meeting, according to Draper, ended after he set forth Respondent's economic conditions both for a Phost agreement and the successor ALP contract.

The parties next met on or about August 21. Draper and Westbrook again represented Respondent; Rubin, Rynearson, and two others represented ALP; no representatives from Phost were present.[6] The meeting lasted for just a few minutes. According to Rynearson, Draper stated that he did not want a 1-year contract with Phost; rather, he wanted a 3-year contract with ALP. Rubin answered that he did not think such a contract was legal—"that we had no production workers out there, we were not producing anything. . . ." Corroborating Rynearson, Rubin added that he asked Draper to consult with his lawyers concerning the legality of a 3-year contract with ALP in such circumstances. Draper testified that he made an economic counterproposal to the 1-year Phost proposal, and as to the 3-year ALP proposal, Rubin stated that there was not a problem regarding the economics but that he questioned the legality of the contract term. According to Draper, Rubin asked that the parties "enter into a voluntary submission" to the Board concerning the legality of a 3-year contract with ALP. Draper agreed to consult with his attorney, and the meeting ended.

While these negotiations continued, Phost commenced work on constructing the new sawmill building at the AWP site. Thus, site preparation work began on July 7, and demolition of the original mill was accomplished a few days later. Next, in early October work on erecting the new sawmill started, with such performed by employees of subcontractors, all of whom were union members. By early December, work on the buiding skeleton had been completed; all outside sheeting was affixed to the structure; and the roof was in place. Further, all concrete had been poured. The record discloses that, while all this work was done, other than supervisory personnel who may have observed the project from time to time, there have been—and will be—no ALP employees at all on the site during the construction work. Also, according to Rynearson, no ALP employees have visited the project to maintain equipment in the left-standing structures.

[4] As to ALP's intentions, the signed contract states: "Whereas the Owner desires to renovate its sawmill which is approximately six (6) miles from Wrangell, Alaska. . . ."

[5] Other than as owner and general contractor, there is no evidence in the record of any sort of business or other financial relationship between ALP and Phost.

[6] While Rubin appears to have been the management spokesman at this and the earlier meeting, there is no evidence that such was ever communicated to Respondent or that Rubin ever represented himself as the agent of Phost. In fact, at the hearing, Rubin identified himself as the attorney for ALP. Despite this, because he spoke at the July 21 meeting, Rubin was considered, by Draper, to be the bargaining agent for Phost at the August meeting.

At some point after August 21, Phost and UPIU entered into a collective-bargaining agreement, covering construction work at the AWP site. On or about October 14, Agent Draper telephoned Rubin's office in Seattle, Washington, and requested a meeting. Such was scheduled for October 16 at Rubin's Seattle office, and Rubin asked Kurt Sacknitz, the vice president and treasurer of Alaska Pulp America, Inc., to be present. According to Sacknitz, he, Rubin, and another attorney from Rubin's law firm were present along with Draper and Westbrook.[7] Draper began by asking if Rubin was aware of the Phost-UPIU contract. Rubin acknowlegded that he knew about that agreement, and Draper asked if ALP was now willing to enter into a 3-year collective-bargaining agreement with Respondent. Rubin replied that such was a contract would be unlawful. "Mr. Draper responded that if we were unwilling to sign a contract, that the union would then file an unfair labor practice claim and that they would picket the construction site." Rubin asked time for a caucus and, after he and Sacknitz returned, Rubin asked if it was true that Respondent intended to picket the site. "Mr. Draper indicated that that's what would happen." Rubin replied that he would speak to ALP officials about Draper's comments; Draper gave Rubin until the following Friday to answer. The meeting ended at this point.

Rubin testified that Draper asked if he knew that Phost's employees had been organized by the UPIU and that Phost had signed a contract. Rubin said that he knew. Draper said that Respondent continued to insist on a 3-year contract with ALP, and Rubin reiterated his doubts as the legality of that approach to a production agreement. Draper replied "that we either signed a [3-] year extension of the labor contract . . . or they would picket the construction site." The management representatives then left in order to caucus and, after returning, Rubin asked Draper to repeat the last statement. "He said, yes, 'ALP either signs a [3-] year extension of the labor contract, or else we will picket the construction site.'" Rubin replied that he had to discuss the matter with ALP officials, and the meeting ended. Following this meeting Rubin telephoned Klarquist, and "we discussed the threat."

Draper testified that he began the meeting by asking Rubin if he knew that the UPIU had been organizing Phost's employees and that Phost had recognized and bargained to an agreement with that union. Rubin replied that he knew, and Draper then stated that he was not there for the purpose of bargaining about Phost but rather "for the specific purpose of renewing our existing labor agreement between 2362 and Alaska Wood Products." Rubin then stated that economics were not the issue; the major issue was the duration of the agreement. Draper replied that Respondent believed its demand was unlawul. Rubin responded that such was an area of controversy but that ALP would be willing to enter into a 1-year agreement. Draper replied that a 3-year contract was Respondent's final position inasmuch as the industry was structured in such a manner. Rubin asked where they could go from there, and Draper responded, "If we do not consummate an agreement of three years duration I would conclude that we are at impasse . . . I will picket the AWP mill with pickets if we do not get a [3-] year agreement." After this statement, Draper again volunteered the information that he was not there to negotiate for a Phost agreement. At that point, the ALP representatives left the room to caucus. Rubin returned after 15 minutes and said that there would be nothing further and that he had to confer with higher corporate officials. The meeting ended with Rubin saying he would contact Draper by the following Friday.[8]

Robert Westbrook gave rather sketchy testimony regarding this meeting. However, he did recall that Draper began by asking whether the ALP people knew that Phost had agreed on a collective-bargaining agreement with the UPIU and by stating that he was there to negotiate a 3-year agreement with ALP. Further, he recalled that Draper said, "[W]e'll picket AWP mill."

At the time of the hearing, work on the new sawmill had not been completed. Although unclear, it appears that, at least, some ducting and electrical work remain to be done as well as the installation and testing of the mill machinery. Draper admitted knowledge that portion of the remaining work was to be done by employees of subcontractors and that they were to be union-signatory subcontractors. To date, there has been no picketing at the AWP jobsite.

C. Analysis

Both counsel for the General Counsel and for Phost contend that Draper's statement to Attorney Rubin, that either ALP enter into a 3-year collective-bargaining agreement with Respondent or the latter would picket the construction site, constituted a threat to picket Phost to force it to cease doing business with ALP or to force ALP to enter into an agreement with Respondent. They further contend that such a threat is blatantly violative of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act when, as herein involved, ALP has no presence at the AWP jobsite. Contrary to this position, Respondent argues that Draper's statement to Rubin, that Respondent would picket the AWP mill if ALP did not enter into a 3-year agreement,[9] does not constitute a threat within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act as such was "merely informative of a dispute which extended to the jobsite," that ALP has, indeed, maintained a presence on the jobsite during the construction work, and that rather than being an unoffending neutral party to the dispute, Phost and ALP are allies herein.

---

[7] No Phost representatives appeared at this meeting. Nevertheless, Draper testified that Rubin was the spokesman for ALP "and, I assume, Phost Construction, at that time." There is no evidence that Rubin ever so represented his status at this meeting.

[8] As of the date of this meeting, according to Draper, he had no direct knowledge as to the state of the work being done at the AWP site.

[9] All parties concede that whether one credits the version of Respondent's witnesses or that of the General Counsel's witnesses, the legal effect would be the same.

Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B), insofar as is relevant herein, prohibits a union or its agents from threatening, restraining, or coercing secondary employers, where objects of such conduct are to force or require a secondary employer to cease doing business with the primary (or disputing) employer; or to force or require the primary to recognize and/or bargain with the union. As stated by a United States circuit court of appeals, Section 8(b)(4) ". . . was not meant to prohibit primary activity. [It was] directed only at secondary boycotts whose 'core concept' is union pressure directed at a neutral employer." Griffith Company, et al. v. N.L.R.B., 545 F.2d 1194, 1199 (9th Cir. 1976). In concluding that a union has engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B), the Board considers two elements as crucial to the violation: A cease doing business objective and coercion of the secondary employer to achieve the proscribed object. Local 399, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (Illinois Bell Telephone Company), 235 NLRB 555, 559 (1978); International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO; Local 134, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO; Local 165, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO (Illinois Bell Telephone Company), 179 NLRB 202, 204 (1969). Regarding the latter point, the Act reaches only threats, restraints, or coercion of a secondary employer. N.L.R.B. v. Servette, Inc., 377 U.S. 46, 55, fn. 12 (1964); International Hod Carriers, Building and Common Laborers' Union of America, Local No. 1140, AFL-CIO (Gilmore Construction Company), 127 NLRB 541, 545, fn. 6 (1960).

Herein, as expostulated by counsel for the General Counsel, the major premise of the complaint—and, indeed, the basis for much, if not all, of the legal arguments in the post-hearing briefs—is the alleged unlawful and coercive effect of picketing by Respondent at the AWP jobsite, if such occurred as threatened by Respondent. What appears to have been overlooked by this approach are the circumstances of Draper's threat. Was it directed, as required for a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act, to an unoffending neutral party (Phost), to the dispute between ALP and Respondent or was said threat directed toward the primary or disputing party—ALP? In asserting that Draper's conduct was secondary and directed at Phost, without citing any record testimony or other supporting facts, counsel for the General Counsel alleges that Attorney Rubin's status was that of the "common representative" of both Phost and ALP at the October 16 meeting. I do not think that the record warrants such a conclusion.

At the outset, there exists not a scintilla of record evidence as to the specific authority of Attorney Rubin to act as an agent or spokesman for Phost or as to whether such authority was ever represented to Respondent. At most, the record reflects a mere "assumption" by Draper that Rubin was the bargaining agent for Phost. Indeed, Rubin identified himself at the hearing as a partner in the law firm which represents ALP and testified that he represented the interest of ALP in contract negotiations with Phost and labor negotiations with the Alaska Building Trades Council. Moreover, Rubin's conduct at the negotiating sessions with Respondent on July 21 and August 21 does not warrant a contrary conclusion as to his status. Thus, I believe that ALP desired these meetings in order to resolve its own lingering contractual problems with Respondent and, in the process, to assure that the construction work at the AWP site proceeded free of labor-related disputes. Viewed in this light, it seems clear that the real bargaining parties were ALP, represented by Rubin, and Respondent, with Phost as an interested observer, and that Rubin was representing the interests of ALP, and only peripherally those of Phost, when he offered to Respondent, as a counterproposal to the latter's demand for a 3-year production agreement with ALP, a 1-year construction contract with Phost. That Rubin spoke for ALP is also clear from his conduct at the August 21 session wherein he refused to accede to Draper's demand inasmuch as "we" have no production workers at the jobsite. Finally, my view of Rubin's status as only acting as an agent for ALP is supported by the entire circumstances herein—based on its own self-interests, ALP consented to attempt to persuade Phost to sign a labor agreement for work at the AWP site; ALP, in fact, persuaded Phost to do so; and in view of its desire to have the project completed expeditiously, ALP was in a position to gain the most by having the sawmill project completed free of labor strife.

However, assuming that Rubin was the "common representative" of Phost and ALP at the earlier bargaining sessions, a point about which I remain unconvinced, Rubin clearly represented only the interests of ALP during the October 16 meeting with Draper. Thus, prior to said date, Phost had, independently, recognized and bargained to an agreement with the UPIU covering the construction work, and at the meeting Draper, on at least two occasions, told Rubin that he (Draper) was not there to negotiate about Phost but only regarding a new collective-bargaining agreement with ALP. Further, the subject matter discussed pertained only to ALP and involved whether ALP would accept Draper's demand for a contract with a 3-year term and Rubin's counterproposal of an agreement with ALP for 1 year. Hence, while Draper again "assumed" that Rubin also represented Phost at this meeting, it is clear that the only parties to this meeting were ALP (Rubin) and Respondent. Accordingly, I believe that, when Draper uttered his threat to engage in picketing at the AWP jobsite, he did so to Attorney Rubin as the representative of ALP after Rubin, as the representative of ALP, refused Draper's demand for a 3-year contract. I believe that the foregoing, in the circumstances of this case, constituted nothing more than a threat of potentially unlawful picketing directed to a primary or disputing party—conduct which is not proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act. Cf. Local 399 (Illinois Bell Telephone Company), supra; Gilmore Construction Company, supra. I do not believe that, in any sense of the meaning of that section of the Act, Draper's threat was made to the unoffending secondary employer (Phost) either directly or indirectly through a "common representative" of that party.[10] Accordingly, given the state of the record, and the factors upon which counsel for the General Counsel concentrated, he has not proven, by a preponderance of the evidence, that Respondent threatened, restrained, or coerced Phost in order to achieve the proscribed object or objects,[11] and I shall, therefore, recommend that the complaint herein be dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Phost is an employer and a person engaged in commerce and in an industry affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.
2. Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. Respondent did not violate Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act by threatening ALP with picketing of the AWP jobsite unless ALP agreed to enter into a 3-year collective-bargaining agreement.

On the basis of the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record herein, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I recommend the issuance of the following:

ORDER[12]

The complaint shall be, and is, dismissed in its entirety.

[10] The fact that Rubin communicated Draper's threat to Klarquist immediately after Draper left the office is not determinative. Thus, unlike the situation in which a threat to an employee could reasonably be expected to be communicated to management officials, there is nothing in the record from which to draw the inference that Draper should have expected Rubin to communicate his threat to Klarquist. To the contrary, Rubin specifically stated that he would communicate Draper's ultimatum to ALP management officials and never mentioned Phost, which party, of course, was not involved at that time.

[11] I make no findings herein regarding the legality of Draper's threat had it been directed toward a neutral party to the dispute between ALP and Respondent or regarding the picketing itself, if such had occurred.

[12] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Case 20–CD–575

January 5, 1982

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, Zimmerman

This is a proceeding under Section 10(k) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, following a charge filed by Quad C Corporation, herein called the Employer, alleging that District Council of Painters No. 8, of the International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO, and Painters and Paper Hangers Local Union No. 4, AFL–CIO, herein called the Painters, had violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act by engaging in certain proscribed activity with an object of forcing or requiring the Employer to assign certain work to its members rather than to employees represented by Operative Plasterers Local Union No. 66, Operative Plasterers and Cement Masons International Association, herein called the Plasterers.

Pursuant to notice, a hearing was held before Hearing Officer Charles L. Posner on September 8 and 9, 1981. All parties appeared and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to adduce evidence bearing on the issues. Thereafter, the Employer and the Painters filed briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the Hearing Officer's rulings made at the hearing and finds that they are free from prejudicial error. They are hereby affirmed.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following findings:

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER

The parties stipulated, and we find, that the Employer, a California corporation with its principal place of business in San Francisco, California, is engaged in the business of residential and commercial construction. During the past year, the Employer purchased and received goods and services from directly outside the State having a value in excess of $50,000. The parties also stipulated, and we find, that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

259 NLRB No. 115

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The parties stipulated, and we find, that the Painters and the Plasterers are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of the Dispute

The Employer operates as a general contractor and subcontractor doing plastering, sheetrocking, fireproofing, taping, and related work. Dinwiddie Construction Company, a general contractor, subcontracted the fireproofing, lathing, plastering, and drywall work at its Crocker Building construction site to the Employer. Pursuant to its contract with the Plasterers, the Employer assigned the taping of drywall to its employees who are represented by the Plasterers. In the first week of June 1981,[1] William Lewis, Dinwiddie's senior vice president, received a phone call from John Davidson, business representative of Painters Local 4. Davidson told Lewis that the Painters had a problem with the Employer's use of plasterers rather than painters to perform the taping work on the Crocker Building construction project. Subsequently, when Davidson met with Lewis to discuss the assigment of the taping work, Davidson stated that the Painters had jurisdiction over the taping work and threatened to picket the jobsite if the Employer did not agree to use painters rather than plasterers. On June 16, Davidson informed Lewis that he had obtained a strike sanction and would picket the jobsite the following morning.

At 7:10 a.m. on June 17, Lewis observed four Painters pickets, including Davidson, at the Crocker Building jobsite. On this same morning, Lewis informed Antonio Gheno, the Employer's job superintendent, about the picketing activity and directed Gheno to remove from the jobsite the Employer's employees who were doing taping work. Gheno removed those plasterers and the picketing ceased.

Two days later, the Employer's plasterers resumed the taping work. Thereafter, on June 26, Davidson telephoned Lewis and again threatened to picket if the plasterers did not discontinue the performance of taping work.

[1] All dates are in 1981 unless otherwise stated.

B. The Work in Dispute

The work in dispute involves the taping of drywall at the Crocker Building construction site in San Francisco, California. More specifically, the disputed work involves the application of paper tape and joint compound to cover and smooth out joints, nail holes, and nailheads in sheetrock walls and ceilings.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer and the Plasterers contend that a jurisdictional dispute exists and that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated. They further contend that the Employer's contract with the Plasterers and considerations of efficiency, economy, established practice, area and industry practice, and skills involved support the Employer's assignment of the disputed work to employees of the Employer represented by the Plasterers.

Before the Hearing Officer, but not in its brief, the Painters contended that there are insufficient facts to establish that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred. As to the disputed work, the Painters argue that the following factors favor assignment to employees which it represents: Area practice; industry practice; International Jurisdictional Disputes Board awards; agreements between the respective International Unions; and the jurisdictional provision of the Painters constitution.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of the dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed upon a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

It is clear from the record summarized above that the Painters agents claimed the work in dispute and threatened to picket and did picket the Crocker Building construction site with an object of forcing the work to be reassigned from employees represented by the Plasterers to employees represented by the Painters. In addition, the parties have stipulated that the Employer is not bound by any agreed-upon method for voluntary adjustment of the work in dispute.

On the basis of the entire record, we conclude that there is reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there exists no agreed-upon method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that this dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) of the Act requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after giving due consideration to various factors.[2] The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on commonsense and experience reached by balancing those factors involved in a particular case.[3]

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of the dispute before us:

1. Collective-bargaining agreements

The Employer has no collective-bargaining relationship with the Painters. On the other hand, the Employer has since 1970 been a party to a collective-bargaining agreement with the Plasterers covering its employees classified as plasterers. In pertinent part, under the heading "Plasterers Jurisdiction," the agreement states, "All interior and exterior plastering . . . must be done by practical Plasterers of the O.P. and C.M.I.A. This includes . . . the taping and pointing of all joints, nailholes and bruises on wallboard, regardless of the type of materials or tools used. . . ." Thus, the Plasterers contract with the Employer specifically covers the work in dispute. We find that this factor favors assignment of the work to employees represented by the Plasterers.

2. The Employer's practice and preference

The Employer assigned the work in dispute to and prefers to have it performed by employees who are represented by the Plasterers. The Employer currently employs eight or nine plasterers who are members of the Plasterers to perform taping work. Although the Employer has never employed anyone other than plasterers to do the work in dispute, it has occasionally subcontracted this work to other employers who use "tapers" represented by the Painters. This has been done, however, only when the Employer itself has had insufficient manpower to perform the taping function, and thus does not contravene the Employer's own practice of using plasterers to perform the work in dispute.

Based on the foregoing, we find that the Employer's practice and preference favors assigning the work in dispute to employees represented by the Plasterers.

[3] International Association of Machinists, Lodge No. 1743, AFL-CIO (J. A. Jones Construction Company), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

3. Relative skills

As noted above, the disputed work involves the taping of drywall surfaces. Although "tapers" is a job classification of painters, it is undisputed that the tools used in the process are those of plasterers. Both the Plasterers and the Painters have apprentice training programs where taping is taught. Each program has been accredited by the Division of Apprenticeship Standards of the State of California. The Employer, however, in addition to the union apprentice program, has its own training course wherein it teaches taping to employees who are apprentice plasterers.

Based on the foregoing, it appears that both plasterers and painters have the requisite job skills to perform the disputed work. Thus, this factor favors neither group of employees in this jurisdictional work dispute.

4. Union agreements and Joint Board determinations

In 1961, the Painters, Plasterers, and the Bricklayers Union entered into a memorandum of understanding which provides in relevant part that "painting and taping of drywall, regardless of material used, is painters' work, providing the drywall surfaces are not to receive plaster, accoustical or imitation accoustical finishes. The application of texturing to drywall surfaces is the work of painters where paint materials are used. . . ." Subsequent to the execution of the memorandum of understanding, disputes between the Painters and the Plasterers concerning the painting and taping of drywall surfaces produced eight separate 1973 Impartial Jurisdictional Disputes Board (IJDB) awards. Based on the 1961 memorandum, the IJDB awarded the work in each case to the Painters.

In 1978, a hearings panel convened by the Joint Administrative Committee of the Plan for the Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes in the Construction Industry issued a national decision reaffirming the 1961 memorandum allocation of the work in dispute. The IJDB has subsequently relied on the 1978 decision in making 18 separate awards of the painting and taping of drywall in a construction project to the Painters rather than the Plasterers.

The Painters relies heavily on the 1961 memorandum, the 1978 hearings panel decision, and the IJDB awards as the basis for awarding the work in dispute to employees represented by the Painters. The Board has given weight to such factors in the absence of any other determinative criteria.[4] On the other hand, the Board has given little weight to an interunion agreement, or IJDB awards predicated thereon, where, as here, the Employer's past practice is contrary, there is no reference to the agreement in the Employer's contract with the Plasterers, there is no evidence that the Employer has otherwise agreed to be bound by the agreement, and the Plasterers continue to claim the work in dispute.[5] Accordingly, although the 1961 memorandum, the 1978 hearings panel decision, and the IJDB awards are factors favorable to the Painters and the employees it represents, we do not accord them great weight in determining this jurisdictional work dispute.

5. Area practice

John Moylan, the business representative of the Plasterers, testified that it is common practice for contractors in the San Francisco Bay area to use plasterers to tape walls that are to be painted. In support thereof, the Plasterers presented a list containing the names of 19 major projects in which plasterers allegedly performed taping on walls that were to be painted. The record indicates, however, that all of those major projects involved work by Marconi Plastering Company, a company that utilizes both painters and plasterers in taping work. In this context, Moylan testified that he did not know which trade's members did the majority of Marconi's taping work.

John Davidson, recorder and secretary of Painters Local 4, testified that the Joint Committee of Painters and Employers maintain records of taping jobs performed by painting contractors. Davidson stated that over 2,500 taping jobs were registered with the Painters Union in the San Francisco and surrounding bay area. In addition to Davidson's testimony, the Painters offered a document entitled "Bay Area Drywall Finishers Joint Agreement." This agreement, between the Painters and employer-members of the Northern California Drywall Contractors Association, covers "work or services pertaining to the preparation, spotting, painting, detailing, taping, flushing, sanding and finishing of interior and/or exterior gypsum, drywall, thinwall, concrete, steel, wood or plastered surfaces." Consequently, it appears from the foregoing that the area practice favors assignment of the disputed work to employees represented by the Painters.

6. Economy and efficiency of operation

In addition to taping work, the Employer utilizes its plasterers to do fireproofing and various other kinds of plastering. By employing the same group of plasterers at different tasks on a particular project the Employer can avoid having an idle work force while taping jobs are drying or setting for several days. In this context, the Employers' superintendent testified, "When they're [plasterers] working for us, we have more control over our job and we're able to take and move the people around as we need them. . . ." In addition, since the Employer performs no painting work, an assignment of the work in dispute to employees represented by the Painters would apparently require the Employer to incur the expense of hiring an additional complement of employees who could perform no work other than the taping work in dispute. We therefore find that the factor of economy and efficiency of operation favors awarding the work in dispute to employees represented by the Plasterers.

Conclusion

Upon the entire record as a whole, and after full consideration of all relevant factors involved, we conclude that the employees who are represented by the Plasterers are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the Employer's collective-bargaining agreement with the Plasterers, the Employer's practice and preference, and economy and efficiency of operation, which factors, on balance outweigh the factors of area practice, interunion agreement, and Joint Board determinations favoring the Painters claim to the work. In making this determination, we are awarding the work in question to employees who are represented by the Plasterers, but not to that Union or its members. The present determination is limited to the particular controversy which gave rise to this proceeding.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

D. Barry Morris, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me in Rochester, New York, on March 13, 30, and 31, 1981. The charge was filed on June 12, 1980, and amended on July 24, 1980. The complaint was issued on July 25, 1980, alleging that Hudson T. Marsden, a Sole Proprietorship (Respondent), violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (the Act). Respondent filed an answer denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

The parties were given full opportunity to participate, to produce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and by Respondent.

Upon the entire record of the case, including my observation of the witnesses, I make the following:

Findings of Fact

I. Jurisdiction

Respondent has maintained its principal office and place of business in Rochester, New York, and is in the business of performing pavement construction and related services. Respondent has admitted, and I so find, that during the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint, it had provided services valued in excess of $50,000 to the city of Rochester. The record contains evidence, and I so find, that during the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint the city of Rochester purchased goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000, which were shipped to Rochester, New York, directly from points outside New York State.

Respondent contends that there is no basis for jurisdiction in this case. In Siemons Mailing Service, 122 NLRB 81, 85 (1958), the Board defined indirect outflow as the "sales of goods or services to users meeting any of the Board's jurisdictional standards except the indirect outflow or indirect inflow standard." The Board also stated in Siemons (id. at 85, fn. 12) that "users" shall include an enterprise or organization which is itself exempted from the Board's jurisdiction if its operations are of the magnitude which would justify assertion of jurisdiction were it nonexempt. See Hoover, Inc., 240 NLRB 593, 594 (1979).

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

I have found that Respondent provided services valued in excess of $50,000 to the city of Rochester and that the city of Rochester purchased goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which were shipped to Rochester directly from points outside New York State. Accordingly, I find that Respondent's operations satisfy the applicable jurisdictional standards, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act for the Board to assert jurisdiction herein. See St. Francis Pie Shop, Inc., 172 NLRB 89, 90 (1968).

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by terminating four employees, namely, Robert Strothers, Ronald Porter, Joseph Ruffin, and John Cole, for engaging in a concerted work stoppage due to inclement weather. The complaint also alleges that Hudson Marsden, the sole proprietor of Respondent, interrogated an employee by asking him who was the instigator of the work stoppage. Respondent denies that it violated the Act. The issues, accordingly, are:

1. Were the employees discharged for having engaged in a concerted work stoppage.
2. Were the discharges violations of the Act.
3. Did Marsden interrogate an employee as to who was the instigator of the work stoppage.

B. The Facts

1. Background

During May 1980 Respondent was replacing sidewalks under contract with the city of Rochester. On May 19[1] Respondent employed a crew of approximately eight employees, consisting of three cement finishers and five laborers. The normal work hours were 8 a.m. to 4 p.m.

2. Reporting for work on May 19

Strothers reported for work around 7:30 a.m. He testified that he had a conversation with Marsden at or around 7:45 a.m., at which time it was raining. Strothers credibly testified that Marsden "asked me about the weather; what did I think. Should we give it a try? And I answered him, yes, give it a try. But, you know if it rains hard we could just give it up." Porter corroborated this testimony. He credibly testified that he reported to work at 8 a.m., at which time it was raining. He stated that "Marsden came out and he asked us what we thought; give it a try or not. So we decided to give it a try."

3. Events occurring between 9:30 and 10:15 a.m.

Marsden left the jobsite around 9:30 a.m. and did not return until 10:15 a.m. The normal time for coffeebreak was around 10 a.m. Strothers testified that it was still "drizzling" when it came time for the break. He discussed the weather with the other employees and decided to leave the jobsite. Porter testified that he talked to his fellow employees, Strothers, Cole, Ruffin, and Young, about the weather. He credibly testified:

> After we went to the job site, we started working and I asked the guys; you know, it was beginning to rain a little harder and they were complaining about working in the rain. So I asked if they wanted to continue to work in the rain or go home.

Porter further testified that the employees continued to discuss the rain during their break, which took place around 10 a.m. He stated that it was still raining after the break and, accordingly, they decided to leave.

While Marsden denied that it was raining that morning, the other witnesses corroborated the testimony of Strothers and Porter. Thus, Cole, Respondent's own witness and still an employee of Respondent, testified that it was still "drizzling" at the time the employees left the jobsite. Eldred, an inspector employed by an unaffiliated consulting firm, testified that there was a "light, drizzling rain." Laine, another of Respondent's witnesses, and also still an employee of Respondent, testified that it was drizzling that morning. He further credibly testified "all of the guys got together and decided that it was time to go home because it was raining too hard." He credibly testified that the employees talked about the rain for 10-15 minutes before they decided to leave. In addition, he credibly testified that that afternoon he told Marsden that the employees left the job because it was raining.

I credit the testimony of Strothers, Porter, Cole, Eldred, and Laine and find that on May 19 there was a drizzle or light rain during the relevant period of 8 to 10:15 a.m.[2] I further credit Strothers' and Porter's testimony, corroborated by Laine's credited testimony, and find that the employees discussed the weather conditions at the time of break, for about 10-15 minutes. They then decided to leave the jobsite because of the rain.

4. Events of May 20 and 21

Strothers testified that he came to work the next morning at 7:40 a.m. He stated:

> I went to Mr. Marsden's house and I walked up and he asked me for my license. I asked him why and he just said that he wanted my license. I said that I wouldn't give him my license. I didn't have to show my license to anyone but the police. The conversation went on and he told me, "You will never drive any of my trucks again and, furthermore, you're fired." And that was it.

---

[1] All dates refer to 1980 unless otherwise specified.

[2] In addition, Resp. Exh. 2, which is a report of the National Weather Service, shows weather conditions of fog and drizzle in Rochester on May 19.

Porter corroborated Strothers' testimony. Porter also testified that, after Marsden told Strothers that he was fired, he instructed Laine, Young, and Boston to go to work. However, he left Porter, Cole, and Ruffin "standing there."

Porter testified that he reported to work on May 21. When asked whether he had any conversation with Marsden at that time, Porter credibly testified:

> I tried to question him, but he wouldn't give me no answer. We got to work that morning and he gave us our checks, Joe Ruffin, John Cole and Strothers and told us that there was no work; Joe Ruffin, myself and Cole.

Marsden testified that he gave Porter a number of reasons for "letting him go." These included smoking marijuana, drinking, not "operating the truck right," having "three flat tires in two weeks" and "stopping at restaurants to have coffee breaks." With respect to Cole and Ruffin, Marsden testified:

> Q. What reason did you give Cole and Ruffin?
> A. Because I don't have any work for them.
> Q. When did you bring them back?
>
> A. The following Monday after I had my chance to have a preliminary investigation as to what happened.
> Q. As to what happened about what?
> A. Them walking off the job. A lot of them were under duress and influenced by other people. They had no choice of transportation back to my shop and they couldn't hold or conduct any work on their own. So they were coerced into leaving the job and returning to the shop.

Similarly, when asked why he discharged Strothers, Marsden testified that Strothers punched out the timecards of the other employees and drank on the job. When questioned as to why he had not discharged Strothers and Porter prior to May 19, Marsden replied, "I don't believe I had just cause at that particular time."

I credit Strothers' and Porter's testimony and conclude that they, Ruffin, and Cole were discharged because they walked off the job on May 19. Marsden admitted that prior to May 19 he did not have "just cause" to discharge Strothers and Porter. While Marsden testified that he did not have work for Ruffin and Cole, he conceded that he rehired them after a "preliminary investigation" as to the circumstances surrounding their walking off the job. Marsden thus admitted that their discharge was not, indeed, because of lack of work, but instead it related to their leaving the job on May 19. I conclude that the various reasons given by Marsden for the discharges, such as lack of work, drinking, improper driving, and, in the case of Strothers, failure to furnish his driver's license, were pretextual. I find that the actual reason for the discharges was the employees' leaving the jobsite on May 19.

5. Prior practices concerning working in the rain

Marsden testified that in the past, if it started to rain while the men were working, it was the practice for the men to take shelter in the doorway of a building, on someone's porch, or in the trucks. This was corroborated by Boston, who testified that, in the past, the men waited for up to an hour in the shanty or in the trucks to see if it would stop raining. If it did not stop, Marsden or his son would instruct the men to leave. Laine and Porter similarly testified. The testimony is uncontroverted that neither Marsden nor his son was at the jobsite on May 19, between 9:30 and 10:15 a.m.

Marsden also testified that raincoats and rain pants were available in the storage wagon. He conceded, however, that there were not "enough to go around." On the other hand, Strothers and Porter stated that rain gear was not provided. Cole testified that there were "some" ponchos available but that he had never used them.

Based on the above testimony, I find that in the past the men took shelter when it started raining and remained there for up to an hour, at which time either Marsden or his son would instruct them to leave. On May 19, from 9:30–10:15 a.m., neither Marsden nor his son was at the jobsite.

With respect to whether rain gear was available, Marsden conceded that there was not enough "to go around." I find that some rain gear was available but that the men were not accustomed to using it. It is questionable whether all the men indeed knew that the rain gear was available. In any event, the practice in the past was to take shelter and wait for the rain to stop, rather than use the rain gear.

6. Strothers' request for a loan

Marsden testified that Strothers requested a loan of $650 on May 16 as a security deposit for renting an apartment. Marsden did not refuse to grant the loan but said that "we would see." Marsden further testified that, on, May 19, Strothers asked for an additional loan of $500 to help a relative in Florida. Marsden stated that he refused this latter loan request, at which point Strothers "threw down his pick and walked away." Strothers testified that he requested a loan of $500 on May 16 for purposes of moving to another apartment. He denied, however, having any conversation with Marsden concerning a loan on May 19. In addition, Strothers denied having any relatives who live in Florida but testified that he and Marsden had a discussion on May 19 concerning the riots in Florida.

I credit Strothers' testimony and find that the only request for a loan was that made on May 16 for $500 to be used as a security deposit for the rental of an apartment. I find that Marsden did not refuse to grant the loan but told Strothers that he "would see" whether to grant it.

7. Interrogation

Paragraph IV of the complaint alleges that Marsden asked an employee who was the "agitator" and "instigator" of the May 19 decision to stop work. In this regard, Strothers testified that, after the men walked off the job, Strothers encountered Marsden, at which time Marsden "pulled up and asked me who the instigator was." Marsden denied asking who was the instigator. Laine, whom I regard as a particularly credible witness, testified that he worked with Marsden the afternoon of May 19. He testified that they discussed the reasons the employees left the job and that Laine told Marsden it was "because it was raining." He denied that Marsden asked him who was the "ringleader."

I find that the General Counsel has not sustained his burden of showing that Marsden asked who was the "agitator" or "instigator." If Marsden was interested in finding that out, it is unlikely that he would not have questioned Laine about it, when they worked together that afternoon. Accordingly, the allegation is dismissed.

C. Discussion and Analysis

In N.L.R.B. v. Washington Aluminum Company, 370 U.S. 9 (1962), the Supreme Court held that the employees were engaged in protected concerted activities when they participated in a work stoppage to protest lack of heat in the plant. The Court held that Section 7 of the Act protects employees' concerted activities to protest unsafe or uncomfortable working conditions. Additionally, the Court held that these Section 7 rights were not dependent on the reasonableness of the employees' protest nor on whether the employees had made a specific demand on the employer to remedy the condition, prior to engaging in the work stoppage. In subsequent cases the Board has reiterated that employees are not required to communicate the reason for their concerted activity to the employer prior to engaging in the activity. See Audio Systems, Inc., 239 NLRB 1316, 1318 (1979). Furthermore, the underlying employee grievances do not have to be reasonable or meritorious in order for the concerted work stoppage to be protected under Section 7 of the Act.[3] See Bay-Wood Industries, Inc., 249 NLRB 403, 406 (1980). The crucial element is that the employees have engaged in a concerted work stoppage to protest working conditions which they consider unacceptable.[4]

I have found that Respondent's employees, after discussion among themselves, decided to walk off the job because they were unwilling to work in the rain. They were thus engaged in a protected concerted work stoppage to protest uncomfortable working conditions. It is clear under Washington Aluminum and its progeny that, when an employer discharges its employees because they have engaged in a concerted work stoppage to protest uncomfortable working conditions, the employer violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Respondent adduced testimony to show that the employees had previously worked in the rain and that the past practice was to have employees wait in the trucks to see if the rain would clear. Respondent also contends that it was not raining hard on May 19 and that the employees had not complained to Marsden about the weather before embarking on their work stoppage.[5]

The crucial issue is not the reasonableness of the employees' complaint but whether the employees walked off the job because of working conditions which they found uncomfortable and objectionable. I have found that the employees left the job because it was raining. As discussed earlier, the cases hold that employees are not required to make prior demand on the employer, nor are their Section 7 rights dependent on the reasonableness of their protest. Accordingly, the fact that it may not have been raining hard or that in the past they may have worked in the rain does not detract from their Section 7 rights.

I have found Marsden was aware of the reason of the employees' work stoppage. He was told by Strothers as the employees were leaving the worksite and later on that afternoon he was told by Laine that the employees left work because of the rain. I have found that he discharged the four employees because of their work stoppage. I have further found that the various reasons given by Marsden for the discharges, including the failure of Strothers to produce a driver's license, were pretextual. The reason for the discharges was the work stoppage. Inasmuch as the work stoppage was protected by Section 7 of the Act, the discharges of the employees by Marsden constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. By discharging Robert Strothers, Ronald Porter, Joseph Ruffin, and John Cole for engaging in a work stoppage because of rainy weather, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act and has thereby engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.
3. The aforesaid unfair labor practices constitute unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
4. Respondent did not violate the Act in any other manner alleged in the complaint.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent having discharged several employees in violation of the Act, I find it necessary to order Respondent to offer them full reinstatement to their former positions or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole for any loss of earnings that they may have suffered.[6]

[3] Accordingly, the fact that the employees took shelter in the past to wait out the rain is irrelevant. Similarly irrelevant is the fact that employees of other construction jobs may have continued to do their work on May 19.

[4] Respondent argues that the work stoppage was engineered by Strothers who was disgruntled because his request for two loans was denied. To the contrary, I have found that Strothers' only request for a loan was on May 16 and that request was not refused. Instead, Marsden said that he would consider the matter. In addition, the fact that Strothers may have had an additional personal reason for leaving the jobsite does not deprive the work stoppage of its concerted character or protection under Sec. 7. See Kendick Engineering, Inc., 244 NLRB 989 (1979).

[5] In this connection, it is uncontroverted that from 9:30 until 10:15 a.m. neither Marsden nor his son was at the jobsite. Accordingly, even had the employees desired to give advance notice of their intention to leave work, there was no one to whom they could have given such notice.

Backpay shall be computed in accordance with the formula approved in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[7]

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and upon the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[8]

The Respondent, Hudson T. Marsden, a Sole Proprietorship, Rochester, New York, his agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Discharging employees because they have engaged in protected concerted activities.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer to Robert Strothers and Ronald Porter immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole for any loss of earnings, in the manner set forth in the section above entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Make whole Joseph Ruffin and John Cole for any loss of earnings, in the manner set forth in the section above entitled "The Remedy."

(c) Post at its facility in Rochester, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 3, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 3, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that those allegations of the complaint as to which no violations have been found are hereby dismissed.

[6] Ruffin and Cole were reinstated on May 26, 1980.

[7] See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716, 717-721 (1962).

[8] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[9] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On June 29, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Donald R. Holley issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the Respondent, the Union, and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge, to modify his remedy,[2] and to adopt his recommended Order,[3] as modified herein.[4]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Fieldcrest Mills, Inc., Scottsboro, Alabama, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Insert the following as paragraph 1(d) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly:

"(d) Requesting employees to engage in surveillance of the union activities of others and report such activities to it."

2. Insert the following as paragraph 2(b) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly:

"(b) Expunge from its files and records any references to the discharge of Ray Hughey on November 28, 1979, and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future discipline against him."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

We will not intimidate employees because they engage in union activity.

We will not request employees to engage in surveillance of the union activities of others and report such activities to us.

We will not discourage membership in or activities on behalf of Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL-CIO, CLC, or any other labor organization of our employees by discharging, transferring, or laying off employees because of their membership in or activities on behalf of the above-named Union or any other labor organization.

We will not in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] See Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), for rationale on interest payments.

[3] We adopt the Administrative Law Judge's recommendation to issue a broad cease-and-desist order requiring the Respondent to cease and desist from violating the Act "in any other manner" on the basis that the Respondent had committed egregious and widespread unfair labor practices. See Hickmott Foods, Inc., 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

Member Zimmerman finds that the issuance of a broad order is inappropriate under the standards set forth in Hickmott Foods, Inc., supra.

[4] We have adopted the Administrative Law Judge's finding that the Respondent unlawfully discharged employee Ray Hughey for engaging in union activities. Consequently, we shall modify the recommended Order to provide that the Respondent expunge from its files and records any references to the unlawful discharge.

259 NLRB No. 98

WE WILL expunge from our files and records any references to the discharge of Ray Hughey on November 28, 1979, and WE WILL notify him that this has been done and that evidence of the unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future discipline against him.

FIELDCREST MILLS, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DONALD R. HOLLEY, Administrative Law Judge: Upon an original charge filed on December 17, 1979, and amended charges filed on January 10 and 31, 1980,[1] the Regional Director for Region 10 of the National Labor Relations Board (herein called the Board) issued a complaint on March 12 alleging that Fieldcrest Mills, Inc. (herein called Respondent), had, by specified conduct, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (herein called the Act). Respondent filed timely answer to the complaint denying that it had engaged in the unfair labor practices alleged.

On December 19, 1979, an election by secret ballot was conducted among employees of Respondent, and subsequently the petitioning Union, Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL-CIO, CLC (herein called the Union), filed objections to the election. Thereafter, on March 26, 1980, the Regional Director issued his Report on Objections, order directing hearing, consolidating cases and notice of hearing, thereby consolidating Case 10-RC-11929 with the instant unfair labor practice case for hearing.

The hearing was conducted in Scottsboro, Alabama, on August 11, 12, 13, and 14, 1980. All parties appeared and were afforded full opportunity to participate. Upon the entire record, my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses during their testimony, and the post-hearing briefs of the parties, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a Delaware corporation, maintains a place of business in Scottsboro, Alabama, where it is engaged in the manufacture of bath and carpet products. During the calendar year preceding issuance of the complaint, it purchased and received at its Scottsboro plant goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of Alabama. Upon these admitted facts, I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. STATUS OF LABOR ORGANIZATION

It is admitted, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent utilizes approximately 200 employees at its Scottsboro plant, where it is engaged in the manufacture of bathroom accessories including commode tank covers, commode lid covers, and bathroom carpets. At all times material, such employees were supervised by: Joseph P. Foster, vice president and general manager; Ronald Blanton, personnel manager; Carl Cameron, superintendent; Charles Graves, superintendent; Kenneth Potter, manager of industrial engineering; and Line Supervisors Denton Layfield, Rufus Thompson, Tom Webb, Edward Chambers, and Tommy Womack.[2]

While the record fails to reveal the full extent of Respondent's operations at places other than Scottsboro, Alabama, its regional personnel manager, Osmond Raines, indicated during his testimony that he and another person holding a like title provide personnel direction at the corporate level. Raines is in charge of personnel matters at some 18 of Respondent's plants and service companies, and indicated that with exception of Respondent's Columbus towel mill complex, consisting of 3 plants, and its Salisbury, North Carolina, finishing plant, the plants are nonunion.

Commencing in April 1978, the Union sought to organize the employees who worked at the Scottsboro plant. It is undisputed that William Dodson and Wanda Willmon, alleged discriminatees in the instant case, were active on behalf of the Union during the campaign. During that campaign, Willmon served on the Union's in-plant organizing committee which consisted of some 25 employees and she wore a union committee badge and a prounion T-shirt in the plant on occasion. It is undisputed that Respondent's management officials were aware of her prounion sentiments during the 1978 campaign. It is likewise undisputed that Dodson was the chairman of the Union's in-plant organizing committee in 1978, and that his position was well known to supervisors of Respondent, including then Supervisor Homer Morris whom Dodson voluntarily told of his union activity. In addition to wearing a union committee button and a prounion T-shirt during the 1978 campaign, Dodson admittedly told Supervisor Morris at the outset of the campaign that he intended to do all he could to see that the plant was organized.

Around July 1978, after Dodson's widespread and open union activity, Morris called Dodson into his office and told Dodson that his job, raw materials handler, was being eliminated as a result of a timestudy. As a result of this job elimination, Dodson suffered a pay cut of 19 cents per hour and was given the job of service operator, which combined the duties of bundle handler and the serving duties of his old raw materials handler job (job no. 8258). A charge alleging that Dodson was transferred for discriminatory reasons was filed, but it was subsequently dismissed.

[1] All dates herein are 1980 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] Respondent stipulated that Chambers and Womack have been supervisors since September 1, 1979. It is admitted, and I find, that the named individuals, as well as Osmond Raines, regional personnel manager, are, and have been, supervisors within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

A Board-supervised election was held at the Scottsboro plant at an undisclosed time in 1978. The Union lost the election.

In early September 1979, the Union once again sought to organize Respondent's Scottsboro plant employees. Employee Dodson was selected as the chairman of the in-plant organizing committee and it is undisputed that he immediately informed Personnel Manager Blanton and Superintendent Charles Graves that they had a union campaign going and he was going to do everything he could to see that the plant was organized.

Respondent admittedly informed its Scottsboro plant employees at the outset of the 1979 organizational campaign that it was opposed to the Union and intended to do what it could legally do to keep it out. Osmond (Ozzie) Raines, its regional personnel manager, was dispatched from Respondent's headquarters located in Eden, North Carolina, to plan and implement Respondent's efforts to oppose the Union.

As revealed by the complaint herein, the General Counsel contends that Respondent's managerial officials and its supervisors repeatedly engaged in conduct which interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees during the union campaign. Additionally, he claims that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by suspending and then discharging employee Wanda Willmon, by transferring and then laying off William Dodson, and by discharging employee Ray Hughey.

B. The Alleged 8(a)(1) Violations

Paragraphs 7 through 16 of the complaint allege that at various times during the union campaign named Respondent supervisors engaged in conduct which independently violates Section 8(a)(1). The conduct attributed to each of the named supervisors is discussed below.

1. Conduct of Carl Cameron

Paragraph 7 of the complaint alleges that Respondent Superintendent Carl Cameron unlawfully interrogated employees on June 19, July 2, August 1, September 3, October 1, November 1, and December 19, 1979. Paragraph 8 of the cmmplaint alleges that Cameron, on or about September 24, 1979, solicited employees to attend union meetings and report to Respondent the identity and activities of employees attending those meetings. The General Counsel sought to prove the allegations through the testimony of employees George Smith and Thomas Goins.

George Smith, who was hired as a bundle boy or service handler on April 21, 1979, and who was still employed at the time of the hearing, testified that in June 1979, while he was in Cameron's office, Cameron told him they expected the Union to start campaigning pretty soon and that he, Cameron, would appreciate it if he would tell him if he saw or heard anyone talking about the Union or saw anyone signing union cards. Smith claims that in July and August Cameron repeated his request that the employee keep him informed of union activity. When the union campaign did begin in September, Smith asserts that Cameron informed him the Union had started up and he would appreciate it if he would tell him anything he knew about people passing out union cards, signing them, or saying anything to him about the Union. Smith testified that Cameron continued to ask him to inform on others in October and he indicated that on November 8 he was summoned to the personnel office where Blanton and Cameron indicated they had learned he had signed a union card and they were displeased with him. On that occasion, Smith recalled that Blanton started the conversation by stating: "Frankly, I'm pissed! Do you think I'm doing my job right?" When Smith said he thought Blanton was doing a pretty good job, Blanton replied: "Well you must not think so, you signed one of those damned union cards." According to Smith, Blanton then asked: "What do you think this damn son-of-a-bitching Union is going to do for you? I gave you a job, they didn't. How would you feel if I told you you didn't do your job right?" When Smith responded he would feel pretty bad about it, Blanton stated: "It makes me mad when someone tells me I can't do my job right. You must think so because you signed one of those union cards." At that point, Smith claims Cameron stated he felt the same way as Ron and commented that the Union could do nothing for him, and observed that he needed his job for his wife and baby. When Smith agreed, Cameron stated that all the Union "wants is your money." Finally, Smith asserted that Cameron asked him several days before the election, which was held on December 19, if he was still with them on the Union.[3]

Employee Goins testified that Cameron discussed the union situation with him on several occasions during 1979. On one occasion, Goins claims Cameron asked him if he was for the Union and he replied "yeah," 100 percent. On another occasion placed by Goins as being late in September, he claims Cameron asked him, while he was in the supervisor's office, if he would agree to go to union meetings and report who attended and what they said. Goins testified that he agreed to go to meetings and report who attended, but he told Cameron he did not know about reporting back what was said. According to Goins, Cameron told him at the conclusion of the latter conversation that he would check with Foster and Ron Blanton and get back to him to let him know whether he should go to the meetings.

While Goins testified on direct examination that he was asked to go to union meetings before he told Cameron he was 100 percent for the Union, Respondent's counsel directed the employee's attention to his pretrial affidavit during cross-examination, and the witness agreed he had truthfully indicated in the affidavit that he had told Cameron he was for the Union before he was asked to attend union meetings.

When he appeared as a witness, Cameron generally denied that he asked employee Smith to report union activity to him at any time. Significantly, Cameron did not deny Smith's version of the November 8 conversation in Blanton's office. Similarly, Cameron denied that he asked employee Goins to attend union meetings and report who attended and what was said. Cameron did not deny that he had asked Goins if he was for the Union. While Cameron admitted discussing the Union "casually" with Foster, he testified Foster did not tell him to do anything in particular; that Foster told him they were going to do everything they legally could to keep the Union out of the plant. Blanton was asked no questions concerning the November 8 incident described by Smith when he appeared as a witness.

[3] Respondent placed Smith's pretrial affidavit in the record as Resp. Exh. 1. Smith's testimony during the hearing is in accord with the statements made in the affidavit.

While credibility resolutions pose problems at times, such is not the case here. Smith and Goins were impressive witnesses, but I was unimpressed by Cameron's general denial that he asked the employees in question to act as informers for the Company. I credit the testimony of Smith and Goins and find that Respondent through the described conduct of Cameron and Blanton violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by: (1) interrogating employees concerning their union activities; (2) requesting that employees engage in surveillance of the union activities of others and report such activities to Respondent; and (3) threatening and intimidating an employee because he engaged in union activities.

2. Conduct of Ronald Blanton

Paragraph 7 of the complaint alleges that Ron Blanton unlawfully interrogated employees on December 12, and paragraph 15 of the complaint alleges that Blanton unlawfully solicited grievances from employees on the same date. The General Counsel sought to prove the allegations through the testimony of employee Olivia Dabbs.

Employee Dabbs testified that she was told to report to the personnel office during the first week in December. When she reported, Blanton opened the conversation by saying they used to talk a lot, but did not seem to talk any more. Dabbs asserts she replied that they had tried to solve some problems with Blanton, but he did not seem interested. At that point, Blanton asked the employee if she thought the Union would help solve her problems, and she replied she thought it would help. Blanton then informed her that if the Union came in they would still have to come to Foster, Cameron, or himself with their problems. Dabbs claims she then commented that Blanton appeared to feel the Union was going to get in, and she asserts Blanton replied, "It is beat and they know it." Dabbs testified she then observed her machine was not working properly and claims Blanton asked her why she did not get one of her good mechanic friends that was for the Union to fix her machine. At the time of the hearing, Dabbs no longer worked for Respondent.

Blanton indirectly denied that he talked to Dabbs in December 1979 by testifying that he recalled talking to her about her problems in his office in 1978, and he recalled that in June 1979 she discussed the slowness of her machine with him and requested that Potter, the timestudy expert, time her machine. Dabbs appeared to be a straightforward individual while giving her testimony and the outcome of the case will not affect her as she now works elsewhere. I credit her testimony fully.

While an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when its agents solicit grievances from employees during a union campaign and expressly or impliedly suggest that such grievances will be favorably received and acted upon, I am unconvinced in the present situation that the General Counsel has shown that Blanton engaged in such unlawful activity when he conversed with Dabbs in December. It is clear, however, that Blanton indirectly interrogated the employee concerning her union sentiments while she was in his office. Thus, I find that, in early December, Respondent, through Blanton's conduct, interrogated employee Dabbs in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

3. Conduct of Tom Webb

Paragraph 7 of the complaint alleges that Tom Webb engaged in unlawful interrogation of employees on November 1. The General Counsel sought to prove the allegation through the testimony of employee Bill Mitchell.

Employee Mitchell, whose testimony is uncontroverted, testified that sometime in November, while he and Supervisor Webb were at the end of the tagging line, several women wearing union buttons passed by and Webb stated he did not see why they wanted the Union; that the pay was pretty good. Mitchell replied it was not the pay, it was the treatment. Apparently, the General Counsel contends that Webb sought indirectly to ascertain Mitchell's union sentiments by making the above-discussed comment about the women wearing the union buttons. As I view the incident, Webb simply made a statement indicating his opinion and Mitchell treated the statement as if it had been a question directed to him. I find that Webb's statement falls within the purview of Section 8(c) of the Act and that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) through Webb's conduct during the incident under consideration.

4. Conduct of Edward Chambers

Paragraph 7 of the complaint alleges that Supervisor Edward Chambers unlawfully interrogated employees on October 1. The General Counsel sought to prove the allegation through the testimony of employee Sam Sisk.

Employee Sisk testified, without contradiction, that Second-Shift Supervisor Edward Chambers asked him around the last of October why did he want a union. I find, as alleged, that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) through Chambers' described conduct.

5. Conduct of Denton Layfield

Paragraph 7 of the complaint alleges that Supervisor Denton Layfield unlawfully interrogated employees on November 7 and 16. The General Counsel sought to prove the allegations through the testimony of employees Walter Hicks and Ray Hughey.

Employee Hicks testified that he went to Supervisor Layfield's office around November 1 and Layfield asked him if he was still for the Union like he was in the other election. Hicks asserts he then asked Layfield if that was all he had to talk to him about and the supervisor replied, "Well, I am concerned that you are still for the Union." Layfield denies that he had the described conversation with Hicks. Hicks was an impressive witness who was still employed by Respondent at the time of the hearing. As indicated, infra, Layfield was admittedly interested in the union sentiments of employees. I credit Hicks.

Alleged discriminatee Hughey testified that when he was in Layfield's office in mid-November, Layfield asked him how he felt about the Union. He asserts he replied he was for it, and went on to tell Layfield he had worked at a union plant 7 or 8 years before. Hughey claims Layfield then remarked that his wife had worked at a union plant and it did not do her any good. According to Hughey, Layfield then asked him what was wrong between him and Ronald [Blanton] and that he replied Layfield knew what was wrong between him and Ron. Layfield allegedly replied, "Well, you've been wearing a union committee button," and Hughey testified he responded that Layfield knew he had because he had seen him wear it.[4]

Layfield testified that while standing outside his office in early November he remarked to Hughey that Ron had told him he had been seen in the vending room wearing a union button. Layfield claims the employee replied, "Yeah, I was playing with some women." Layfield denied that he had seen Hughey wear a union button, and he denied that he asked Hughey how he felt about the Union. When asked why he discussed the subject of the Union with Hughey on the occasion under discussion, Layfield replied, "Well, to feel him out, how he felt about it."

I credit Hughey's version of the mid-November conversation between him and Layfield. As the supervisor admitted, he was motivated to discuss the union situation with the employee to ascertain his feelings. I find his denial that he asked the employee how he felt about the Union to be unconvincing.

In sum, I find, as alleged, that Respondent, through Layfield's conduct, unlawfully interrogated employees concerning their union activities and sentiments in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in early and mid-November 1979.

6. Conduct of Rufus Thompson

Paragraph 9 of the complaint alleges that Supervisor Rufus Thompson threatened employees with reprisals on November 1 if they selected the Union as their bargaining representative. The General Counsel sought to prove the allegation through the testimony of employees J. B. Justice and Thomas Mitchell.

Employee Justice testified that 2 or 3 days before the December 19 election he and four or five employees, including employee Mitchell, were in the lunch area when Supervisor Thompson appeared and told them if the Company went union they would close it down.

Thomas Mitchell indicated during his testimony that Supervisor Thompson discussed the Union with him on two occasions. Thus, he claims he was in Thompson's office sometime in November and Thompson asked him his opinion of the Union. He claims he replied he had not really thought that much about it and Thompson told him it was something he should think about. According to Mitchell, Thompson then asked him how he intended to vote, and he replied he was going to vote for it. Thereupon, Thompson allegedly asked Mitchell why he wanted a union and stated that "a union is no good; all they do is cause problems; that we don't need no union." Corroborating Justice, Mitchell indicated Thompson came to the break area when Mitchell was there with three or four other employees, including Justice, and told them that the Union was no good; that it had already closed down a couple of plants and it would probably close down this plant; and asked them what they were going to do for a job when it [plant] is closed down.

Supervisor Thompson denied that he ever discussed the Union in employee Justice's presence in 1979. He admitted he discussed the Union with Mitchell in his office but claimed he merely asked Mitchell what he thought the Union could do for him if it came into the mill. According to Thompson, Mitchell indicated he was not strongly for the Union as he had been the other time, and he indicated he did not know how he would vote. While he denied discussing the Union with Justice, Thompson admitted he discussed possible plant closure with employee Mitchell, possibly in the break area. Thompson's version of the conversation was that he told Thomas (Mitchell) that "if the union came in there and they went out on strike, that it is possible the mill will close down because they have, we have to ship our orders out in from two to three weeks, you know, and if we can't sell our goods, we can't operate."

I gained the impression while hearing Thompson's testimony that he was reciting what he should have said, rather than what he actually said to employee Mitchell on the two occasions discussed above. I credit the testimony of employees Justice and Mitchell and find that Respondent, through Thompson's conduct, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by unlawfully interrogating an employee concerning his union sentiments in November 1979, and unlawfully threatening employees in mid-December 1979 by informing them that if the Union got in the plant might be closed.

7. Conduct of Joseph Foster

Paragraph 10 of the complaint alleges that Plant Manager Joseph Foster informed employees on or about October 1, 1979, that if they selected the Union as their bargaining representative there would be a strike and the employees would lose their jobs. The General Counsel sought to prove the allegation through the testimony of employee Mark Shelton.

Shelton testified that, in late October at a first-shift employee meeting, Foster informed employees that they did not need the Union and, if it went union, the first thing that would happen would be that they would call a strike and everybody would be out of a job. Shelton claims Foster told them during the meeting that if they had any kind of a problem to bring it to him and he would take care of it. While Shelton indicated seven or eight employees attended the meeting, the only one he could remember attending was employee Walter Hicks.[5]

[4] Hughey testified he wore the button every day commencing in late October.

[5] The General Counsel did not adduce any testimony through Hicks concerning the meeting.

When he appeared as a witness, Plant Manager Foster testified that he met with 8 to 10 different groups of employees in late September. While he admits he stated Respondent's position on the Union at the meetings, he claims he did so by reading a prepared speech to the employees which was placed in the record as Respondent's Exhibit 31. The written speech states, inter alia:

> I'm also opposed to this Union because of strikers. I'm sure everyone in this room remembers the strike this Union called at the Standard-Coosa-Thatcher plants in Chattanooga last year—the very same union that is trying to get in here. Over 600 employees called out on strike. There was violence on the picket line. People got hurt. Twenty-five (25) employees were fired. Over 100 new employees were hired to replace striking employees. Over $700,000 in wages were lost. For what? For nothing! When the strike was over, the employees went back to work for the same thing the company had offered before the strike.
> I don't want these things to happen here—to you or to our plant. And it's for these reasons that I will use every legal and proper means at our disposal to keep this Union out of our plant.

Respondent's personnel manager, Blanton, corroborated Foster's testimony by indicating that Foster read a prepared speech during the meetings in question.

I credit Foster's assertion that the comments made about the Union during the late September meetings were read from Respondent's Exhibit 31. While I found portions of Foster's testimony to be suspect, Shelton was not a particularly impressive witness. He indicated when testifying that he could not recall who, other than Hicks, attended the meeting he attended, and he stated he did not recall Foster referring to replacement of employees in event a strike occurred. Significantly, the General Counsel did not seek to corroborate his testimony through Hicks. In sum, I find that the General Counsel has failed to offer sufficient evidence to prove the allegation set forth at paragraph 10 of the complaint, and I recommend it be dismissed.

8. Conduct by Ozzie Raines

Paragraph 11 of the complaint alleges that on or about November 5 Respondent promised employees additional benefits if they refrained from joining or engaging in activities on behalf of the Union. The General Counsel sought to prove the allegation through the testimony of employee Leland McCutcheon.

McCutcheon testified that at an employee meeting held in early November Raines informed employees that at the beginning of the year they would receive a small raise and better insurance benefits.

Raines, whose testimony was corroborated to some extent by Respondent employee witnesses Edith Reed and Bonnie Jarell, indicated he spoke with Scottsboro plant employees about a raise and/or improved insurance coverage in June, November, and December.

Raines testified that all Fieldcrest employees were given a wage increase in May 1979. The amount of the increase was limited to 7 percent in accordance with the President's wage and price guidelines. According to Raines, Respondent was the first major company in the textile industry to give raises in 1979, and it was concluded that employee dissatisfaction might result if the average percentage of raise given in the textile industry exceeded 7 percent. Consequently, at his June meetings with Scottsboro plant employees, Raines told them why the May raise was limited to 7 percent and indicated to them that if other companies granted larger raises Fieldcrest would review its position at the end of the year and would make any necessary adjustments. During the June meetings, Raines also informed employees it was aware of employee dissatisfaction with their group insurance, was reviewing the policy, and there was a possibility improvements would be announced by the end of the year.

While McCutcheon recalled that Raines informed employees attending an early November meeting that they would receive a small raise and better insurance benefits the first of the year, Raines credibly testified he informed employees in early November that the Company was still prepared to review its position on the need for a "catch-up" raise at the end of the year and it was still working on the insurance plan.[6]

On December 11, the Union distributed a handbill which was placed in the record as Respondent's Exhibit 17. The document depicts a number of figures seated around a bargaining table and states, inter alia:

> ASK FIELDCREST WHAT'S NEW TODAY
> Fieldcrest, why didn't you tell us that other Fieldcrest workers under ACTWU contracts will begin negotiating today for better wages and fringes?
> Is it a secret that workers just like us, elicited by their fellow union members, will start bargaining today in Eden, N.C.?
> Don't you want us to know that union Fieldcrest workers have a voice in their wages and working conditions?

According to Raines, the above-described handbill caused him to meet with Scottsboro employees on December 13 to discuss what had occurred in bargaining at Eden, North Carolina. He asserts that he informed the employees that nothing was new; that Fieldcrest was meeting with the Union to negotiate a "catch-up" wage increase he had discussed with them in June; and that any increase given in one part of the Company would be given everywhere. Raines testified that his supervisor, who was privy to the negotiations in Eden, had informed him that an offer had been made to the Union and, as it had been favorably received and agreed upon in principle, he could announce to Scottsboro employees that they would receive a special wage adjustment and that the insurance changes would be effective the first of the year. Raines admittedly made such announcement to employees at the December 13 meeting. Subsequently, when final agreement was presumably reached with the [6] As revealed, infra, it is apparent that McCutcheon described what Raines told employees during meetings held on December 13.

Union several days later, Scottsboro Plant Manager Foster admittedly informed employees their special increase of 1-1/2 percent and the improved insurance benefits would become effective on January 6, 1980.

During cross-examination, Raines indicated that other companies in the textile industry reached wage settlements in late June, July, or August which were, on an average, greater than the 7 percent given by Respondent to its employees in May. Pointing to such testimony, the General Counsel contends in his brief that Respondent waited almost 4 months after learning of the higher settlements to give Scottsboro employees a "catch-up" raise because it desired to influence them in the exercise of their Section 7 rights. I am unable to agree.

In American Sunroof Corporation; Automobile Specialty Corporation; American Sunroof Manufacturing Co., 248 NLRB 748 (1980), the Board recently stated:

> The Board has long held that the granting of benefits during an election campaign is not per se unlawful where the employer can show that its actions were governed by factors other than the pending election. And the Board has further held that an employer can meet this burden by showing that the benefits granted were part of an already established company policy and the employer did not deviate from that policy upon the advent of the Union.

In my view, Respondent has made such a showing with respect to the benefits under discussion.

Here, the record reveals that the Union represents employees at several of Respondent's plants, but the employees at most plants, including the Scottsboro plant, are unrepresented. In May, Respondent successfully caused the Union to agree to a 7-percent across-the-board increase for unionized employees. It then gave a companywide across-the-board wage increase of 7 percent. While Respondent's intention, as announced by Raines in both June and November, was apparently to reconsider wages and insurance the first of the year, the Union successfully caused Respondent to agree to a 1-1/2-percent "catch-up" wage increase and improved group insurance in mid-December. Thereupon, Raines announced employees would receive a raise and improved insurance at the end of the year and, within several days, Foster announced the amount of the raise. Again, the benefits were given companywide.

In sum, I conclude that Respondent has shown that, regardless of the presence or absence of union activity and/or a scheduled election, Scottsboro plant employees would have been informed in mid-December 1979 that at the end of the year they would receive a 1-1/2-percent pay raise and improved group insurance which were being given companywide. Consequently, I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that Respondent promised the benefits in question to influence Scottsboro employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights.

9. Conduct of Charles Graves

Paragraph 12 of the complaint alleges that on or about November 12 Supervisor Charles Graves informed employees it would be futile for them to select the Union as their bargaining agent. The General Counsel sought to prove the allegations through the testimony of employee Garland Morris.

Morris testified that Charles Graves approached him while he was with employees Wilkes and Brown in mid-November and informed them "that the union wouldn't be any good for us." and that "we were just talking and wasting our money as far as paying union dues."

I find that Graves' noncoercive remarks were statements of opinion which are permissible by virtue of Section 8(c) of the Act.

10. Conduct of Tommy Womack

Paragraph 13 of the complaint alleges that Supervisor Tommy Womack threatened on or about November 10 to discharge employees if they joined or engaged in activities on behalf of the Union. The General Counsel sought to prove the allegation through the testimony of employee Garland Morris.

Morris testified that Womack approached him while he was at a creel rack in mid-November and asked him if he knew who was behind the Union, who was working for it. When Morris told the supervisor he had no idea, he claims Womack stated if he found out who they were he would see that they were terminated.

While Womack admitted discussing the Union with Morris in mid-November, his version of the conversation is entirely different. He testified that initially the conversation was about work and Morris turned it to a discussion of the Union by telling him someone in the warehouse had given him a union button and he wore it one day and then took it off and threw it away. Womack asserts he then "just stated some facts to him about the union."[7] Womack categorically denied that he asked the employee if he knew who was for the Union and he denied he told him if he found out who was for the Union he would see that they were fired. He claims Morris asked him on one occasion if a person could be discharged if they were for the Union, and that he replied no.

At the time of the hearing, Morris, who was an impressive witness, no longer worked for Respondent. I credit his assertion that Womack asked him if he knew who was behind the Union and threatened to see that such person was fired if he discovered their identity. I find that Respondent, through Womack's described conduct, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

C. The Alleged 8(a)(3) Violations

As indicated, supra, the General Counsel claims that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act during the 1979 union organizational campaign by suspending and then discharging Wanda Willmon, transferring and then laying off William Dodson, and by discharging Ray Hughey. Such contentions are discussed individually below.

---

[7] Womack did not elaborate.

1. The Wanda Willmon situation

Wanda Willmon was hired by Respondent to work as an elastic binder in June 1973.

During both the 1978 and the 1979 union organizational campaigns Willmon actively supported the Union. Thus, she testified that, in addition to signing an authorization card during the 1978 campaign, she wore a union button and T-shirt in the plant and passed out union literature. Similarly, when the 1979 campaign began, she signed a card, became a member of the in-plant organizing committee, and, from the third week in September on, wore a union button in the plant.[8] Respondent concedes management officials were aware of Willmon's prounion sentiments during the 1978 and 1979 campaigns.

Until July 1979, elastic binders accomplished their assigned task of sewing elastic binders completely around toilet lid covers by using a single needle sewing machine which guided and secured the elastic binder completely around the outside edge of the lid covers. In July, Respondent changed the procedure by cutting the lid covers in such a manner as to make approximately three-fourths of the cover round and the remaining one-fourth a straight cut which extended from the two points where the circle and/or arc stopped. The sewing technique was then changed and the elastic was sewn on the outside edge of the circular portion of the lid cover only. When sewing the newly designed lid cover, the elastic binders continued to use a single needle machine to sew the binder from the starting point (beginning of the arc) to the stopping point (end of the arc). However, when the stopping point was reached, the operator was required to remove the lid cover from the single needle machine and use a so-called bar tack machine to place a securing stitch across the elastic at the stopping point or corner.

After the above-described lid change was made, Respondent conducted a timestudy of the operation while Kerri Wilkins, one of its more proficient elastic binders, was performing the new job. The timestudy led to establishment of a new piecework rate and a new expected earnings rate for the job. The new expected earnings rate was $4.54 per hour.

During the 10-week period extending from mid-July to the end of the third week in September, the employees working in the elastic binder job classification were Martha Hambrick, Betty Murphy, Kerri Wilkins, and Wanda Willmon. According to Willmon, all the girls complained about the new piecework rate set for the job but nothing was done about it. Thus, during the 10-week period under discussion, Murphy and Wilkins regularly made expected earnings of $4.54 per hour, but Hambrick and Willmon, who each worked 9 of the 10 weeks, made expected earnings of $4.54 per hour only during the week ending August 10.[9]

Respondent Superintendent Cameron testified that he followed the work of the elastic binders carefully subsequent to the change in the job. After the change, he indicated he informed the operators of their earnings on a daily basis for 4–5 weeks. At the end of that period, Murphy and Wilkins were making expected earnings, but Hambrick and Willmon were not. Cameron testified he discussed the situation with both Hambrick and Willmon, but neither was able to improve her performance sufficiently to meet the $4.54 expected earnings rate set for the job.

Apparently both Hambrick and Willmon realized by late September that they were not going to be able consistently to make expected earnings of $4.54 in the elastic binding job. Thus, Hambrick transferred to another job at the end of the payroll period ending September 30.[10] At or about the same time, Willmon, on October 3, filled out two requests for transfer—one for a goods- handler position in the laundry and one for a forklift operator's job in the shipping department.[11] Willmon was offered the goods-handler position in the laundry on October 4 and she refused it.[12]

During the payroll period ending September 30, 1979, employee Sue Stephens, who had previously worked as an elastic binder employee, returned to the job classification from layoff. From that time until Willmon was terminated during the payroll period ending November 25, 1979, both Stephens and Willmon failed during each week to make expected earnings of $4.54 per hour.[13] Cameron testified that he gave employee Stephens an oral warning for poor production on October 15, but did not warn or discipline her further because she thereafter improved her performance every week.

Willmon received the first of several warnings for poor production on October 10. On that date she was orally warned by Superintendent Cameron for failing to make expected earnings.[14] A second verbal warning was issued on October 15.[15] The oral warnings were followed by a written warning on October 19.[16] She was then warned verbally on November 12,[17] and received a second written warning on November 14.[18] Upon receiving the second written warning, Willmon was suspended for 1 day.[19]

Willmon took her 1-day suspension on November 15. She returned to work on Friday, November 16, and worked that day and the next, Saturday. On Tuesday, November 20, Cameron called her to his office and informed her, in the presence of Personnel Manager Blanton, that he was suspending her pending discharge for bad work and poor production. He produced a toilet lid cover which had the elastic sewn past the corner and informed her she had sewn 115 lids in such a fashion.[20] In addition, he showed her a ticket indicating the number of menders, and she stated she did not think she had that many. Willmon testified she did not intentionally sew elastic improperly on toilet lids under discussion.[21]

Discussion

While the General Counsel has adequately shown that Willmon was an active union adherent and Respondent was aware of her prounion sentiments, he has failed to prove that she was suspended or discharged because she engaged in protected conduct.

Lacking direct evidence which would prove that Respondent suspended and discharged Willmon because she was active on behalf of the Union, the General Counsel claims disparate treatment and contends that the employee was falsely accused of producing 115 bad toilet lid covers. I conclude that the evidence fails to establish either contention.

With respect to the claim of disparate treatment, the General Counsel specifically contends that Stephens and Willmon both failed to make expected earnings during October and November, but only Willmon was punished for it. In making such a contention, the General Counsel ignores some relevant record facts. Thus, as indicated above, Willmon and Hambrick were working in the elastic binder job classification in mid-July when the expected earnings rate for the job was changed from $4.25 per hour to $4.54. During the following 10-week period Willmon and Hambrick made expected earnings on only one occasion. At that point, Hambrick sensibly transferred to another job and Willmon applied for transfer to two other positions. It was in the described context that Stephens entered the job classification during the last week in September. After working in the job classification for 3 weeks, Stephens was orally warned for poor production.[22] Cameron testified that, although Stephens did not immediately make expected earnings after the October 15 oral warning, he did not warn her further because she responded to the warning and her performance improved each week. His assertion is statistically verified.[23] On the other hand, Willmon did not receive her first oral warning for poor production until October 10, at which point she had failed to make expected earnings 10 out of 12 weeks.[24] Further, after she was warned for poor production on October 10, Willmon's average hourly earnings per hour the next week dropped to 3.646 and they thereafter remained under $4.54 through the payroll period ending November 25.[25]

In sum, Stephens worked 3 weeks as an elastic binder and was reprimanded for low production. She improved her production and was not further warned or disciplined. Or the other hand, Willmon actually worked in the job classification for 11 weeks before she was given a warning for poor production. She was offered jobs in other classifications on October 4 and November 12 but refused them. It is clear, and I find, that Respondent did not treat Willmon disparately.

Similarly, I find that I am unable to credit Willmon's assertion that she did not deliberately sew the elastic on 115 toilet lids incorrectly. Respondent had approximately 115 such lids at the hearing and Cameron testified that when they arrived at the inspection department they had dye tickets on them which contained Willmon's initials. When she was terminated, Willmon was shown the dye tickets and admittedly commented she did not think she had that many menders. Moreover, the General Counsel offered no evidence which would show that one of the other elastic binders produced the imperfect lids. In the circumstances, I find that Respondent justifiably decided that Willmon had deliberately sewed the elastic on approximately 115 toilet lid covers in an improper manner.

In sum, I find that the General Counsel has failed to establish, prima facie, that Respondent suspended or discharged Willmon for discriminatory reasons. I find instead that the record reveals she was suspended and discharged for cause.

2. The Ray Hughey situation

Ray Hughey was hired by Respondent as a janitor in July 1978. In September 1979, he was promoted to the position of tub operator. The record reveals that tub operators are the employees that dye the rugs and fabrics utilized at the Scottsboro plant. During the short period he worked as a tub operator, Hughey indicated he received a raise which was given to him in two steps. He further claims that both Supervisor Chambers and his immediate supervisor, Denton Layfield, told him he was doing a "damned" good job; that they had not seen anyone do a job like that before in 4 weeks.

[19] A copy of Respondent's work rules, which are posted on bulletin boards in the plant and which appear on the back of the disciplinary action form used by Respondent, was placed in the record as Resp. Exh. 23. The rules are divided into four groups, groups A, B, C, and D. Violation of group A, B, and C rules leads to immediate suspension and possible discharge. In this case, Respondent contends that employees Willmon and Hughey violated group D rules. The applicable rules and the penalties for violation are:

> GROUP D—WRITTEN WARNING (In case of a second violation of a Group D rule within six months, the employee will be suspended for from one to ten days without pay. In case of a third violation within six months, the employee will be discharged. A Group C violation within six months of a suspension under Group D will result in discharge. A Group D offense within six months of suspension under Group C will result in suspension.)
> 19. Irregular attendance; absence without permission; repeated tardiness.
> 20. Inefficiency or negligence in the performance of duties.
> 21. Permitting avoidable waste of material or supplies.

[20] Willmon recalled the number as 150. She incorrectlv recalled the date of the occasion as being Monday, November 19. Cameron claimed there were 115 bad lid covers and they were made available for inspection by the General Counsel. I credit Cameron.

[21] As the General Counsel failed to show that some other elastic binder may have sewn the lids improperly and the batch of lids was accompanied by Willmon's dye ticket which was initialed by her, I do not credit her denial that she sewed the defective lids.

[22] She received such oral warning on October 15. See G.C. Exh. 4(t).

[24] She made expected earnings only during the week ending August 10, but she was absent a week.

In mid-November, Hughey claims Chambers instructed him to go to Layfield's office. According to Hughey, when he got to the office Layfield asked, "How do you feel about the Union?" Hughey claims he told Layfield he was for the Union and had worked for 7 or 8 years at a unionized plant. He testified that Layfield commented that his wife worked at a union plant and it did not do her any good. At that point in the conversation, Hughey claims Layfield asked him what was wrong between him and Ronald (Blanton). Hughey stated he replied, "You know what is wrong between me and Ron," and Layfield responded, "Well, you've been wearing a union committee button." Hughey testified the conversation ended with him saying, "You know I have, because you've seen me wear it."

On November 28, Hughey arrived at the plant at approximately 2:30 p.m. He testified that he accepted some union literature from an organizer who was standing some 30 to 40 feet from the guard shack and talked to the organizer for about 5 minutes before he entered the plant. Hughey indicated that Superintendent Chambers was at the guard shack looking directly at him at the time. When he punched in to go to work at 3 p.m., Chambers told him that Denton wanted to see him in his office.

Hughey described what happened when he went to Layfield's office as follows:

> A. He said he was going to have to give me four days off and I said, for what? He said for spotting a load of rugs, and I said, where is the rugs? He says right there is one of them and I said, where is the rest of them and he never did say and I asked him for the ticket they was run on and he said "I don't have to show you the ticket," he said, "There's one rug, that's good enough for me" and then I said, "You mean you are giving me four days off for that" and he says, "Yeah." I says, "You are not giving me four days off, you are firing me, ain't you?" He said, "It looks that way."
> Q. Okay, did Mr. Layfield tell you how many rugs you had spotted?
>
> A. He said seventeen.
> Q. Did you spot seventeen rugs?
> A. I didn't, no, because he didn't show me the ticket on them, or show me the rest of the rugs.

Hughey admitted on cross-examination that he told Layfield at the time he was terminated that if he were not such an old man he would "haul his ass across the desk and whip him."

According to Hughey, a fellow tub operator, Leland McCutcheon, had spotted four to five loads of rugs (140 to 150 per load) several nights before November 28, and Layfield simply told him the next day to strip them and redye them.

When he appeared as a witness, Layfield described the tub operator's job in detail and indicated he felt that Hughey's negligence caused the spotting of 17 rugs. Thus, Layfield testified the tub operator begins the dying operation by filling a large tub with water. He then puts certain chemicals in the water and goes to the dye room to get the dye(s) needed to obtain the color desired. The dye is then placed in a 3-gallon bucket, water is added, and the mixture is placed under a nozzle which heats the water to a boil. The operator then stirs the mixture and pours it through a strainer into a second bucket. The tub operator then uses two dippers to put the dye mixture in the tub, which has the carpets to be dyed in it. According to Layfield, the operator half fills one dipper with water and the second with the dye mixture. Then, he adds dye mixture to the dipper holding water and simultaneously spills the diluted dye mixture into the tub as he moves the dipper across it.

Respondent produced the rug shown to Hughey on November 28. It was a dark brown rug which measured approximately 6-1/2 by 5 feet and had a large red spot approximately 7 inches long in the center and several smaller red spots. Layfield testified that such spots were caused when the operator failed to properly mix and strain the dye in the bucket before putting it in the tub.[26] He indicated there was no doubt in his mind that Hughey's negligence was the cause of the spotting.

Layfield denied that he refused to show Hughey the other 16 rugs which had been spotted. He indicated he took the one rug shown to the employee on November 28 to the office for safekeeping and directed that the remaining 16 be stripped and redyed, but claims the spots could not be removed and they were sold for 10 cents a pound as seconds.[27] Layfield testified the dye ticket which accompanied the load of rugs which had been spotted had been lost prior to the hearing.

Layfield indicated during his testimony that he had been on sick leave for 3 weeks prior to returning to work on November 5. He claims that when he returned to work Ron Blanton told him he had seen Hughey wearing a union button in the vending room. According to Layfield, he later spoke to Hughey outside his office and informed him, "Ray, Ron told me that you was seen wearing a union button." He claims the employee replied, "Yeah, I was playing around with some women—joking with some women." Asked why he made the comment, Layfield stated, "Well, to feel him out, how he felt about it."[28]

[26] Employee John Anderson, who had been a tub operator for 2-1/2 years, was shown the rug in question and testified he was of the opinion that undissolved dye caused the spots in the rug.

[27] The rugs under discussion are made exclusively for Sears and are sold to them for $40 apiece. Layfield denied that Hughey asked to see the rest of the rugs and claims they were in a buggy outside his office at the time. I credit his denial.

[28] Layfield neither admitted nor denied that his wife's experience working under union conditions was discussed. I am convinced Layfield did not fully describe the mid-November conversation with Hughey. As indicated, supra, Layfield denied he asked employee Hicks if he was still for the Union like he was the last time and I have credited Hicks. I credit Hughey's version of the mid-November conversation.

Layfield's version of the discharge conversation was to the effect that he told Hughey he had two previous warnings and this—spotting of goods came up—and he would have to suspend him pending discharge. Layfield recalled Hughey replied, "You know G— d— well that ain't the reason I am being fired"; that Hughey then called him foul names; and then said "if he wasn't such an old man he'd snatch him over the desk and beat his ass."

Layfield denied knowing anything about McCutcheon spotting 500 to 600 rugs and denied he ever told McCutcheon, who worked the third shift while he worked the second shift, to strip down that number of rugs and redye them.

According to Layfield, Hughey's union activities had nothing to do with his decision to discharge the employee. Respondent placed in the record as Respondent's Exhibits 19, 20, and 21 two forms entitled "Disciplinary Warning Form" and a copy of a memorandum to Hughey from Layfield dated August 6, 1979. The disciplinary forms reveal Hughey received an oral warning for being absent without permission on May 18, 1979, and written warnings for the same rule violation on June 26, 1979, and August 6, 1979. The August 6 memorandum states, inter alia:

> Having reviewed your attendance with your supervisor, it is my responsibility to advise you of the seriousness of your absentee problem. Your supervisor has talked with you about your attendance record, given you a written warning and has suspended you without pay for your failure to improve your attendance.
> As you are aware, a third violation of our rules for absenteeism within six months is cause for your termination. It is the hope of the management of this company and my personal hope that you will improve your attendance so that you can continue your employment in this mill.
> Thank you,
> /s/ D. E. Layfield

Layfield claims the sole reason for Hughey's termination was the fact that he had three violations of group D rules within a 6-month period and termination was automatic under the rules. He denied that the employee's union activity had anything to do with the decision to discharge him.

Discussion

The Hughey discharge presents a situation in which an employee who was apparently progressing well in a new job was discharged within a short time after Plant Personnel Manager Blanton discovered he supported the Union and shortly after his immediate supervisor interrogated him concerning his union sentiments, indicating at the time that something was wrong between Blanton and him. Moreover, the employee was apparently terminated the first time he erred in the performance of his assigned duties. I find that these factors compel an inference that the employee's participation in protected activities as a motivating factor in his discharge. Consequently, pursuant to the causation test spelled out in Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), I turn to an examination of the evidence offered by Respondent to demonstrate that it would have terminated the employee even in the absence of the protected conduct.

Respondent's principal defense to the allegation that it discharged Hughey because he supported the Union is that it has a company policy which dictates that an employee be terminated if he or she violates its group D rules three times within a 6-month period. To support its contention that Hughey had violated group D rules three times within a 6-month period, Respondent placed in evidence as Respondent's Exhibits 19 and 20 disciplinary action forms revealing that Hughey received written warnings on June 26, 1979, and August 7, 1979, for absence without permission which violated Rule 19. Inspection of the form dated June 26 reveals that that infraction of the rules occurred on June 25. Having placed the above-described disciplinary forms in evidence, Respondent caused Layfield to testify that Hughey's negligent failure to completely dissolve dye before putting it in the tub on November 27 caused the spotting of 17 of 20 rugs and this action amounted to "[i]nefficiency or negligence in the performance of duties" within the meaning of group D Rule 20.[20] Viewing the documents discussed and considering Layfield's testimony, I note that Hughey did not violate group D rules three times in a 6-month period. Instead, accepting Respondent's contention that the rules were violated at the time indicated, it appears Hughey's last violation occurred 6 months and 2 days after the June 25 violation. In the circumstances, I find that Respondent's defense that it discharged the employee pursuant to normal company policy because he violated group D rules three times in a 6-month period does not withstand scrutiny. Accordingly, as I view the situation, Hughey was terminated when, viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to Respondent, he had violated Respondent's rules only twice in a 6-month period. I find he was not terminated in accordance with normal company policy, and conclude that Respondent has failed to rebut the prima facie case of discriminatory discharge established by the General Counsel. It follows, and I find, that Respondent terminated Hughey in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) as alleged.

3. The William Dodson situation

William Dodson was hired by Respondent as a materials handler in July 1969. He was in layoff status at the time of the hearing. When he was laid off on January 7, 1980, Dodson had more plantwide seniority than all but some 15 of Respondent's approximately 200 Scottsboro plant employees.

When the Union conducted its 1978 organizational campaign at the Scottsboro plant, Dodson was the chairman of the in-plant organizing committee. At the outset of the campaign, he informed his supervisor, Homer Morris, about the second week in April that they had a union campaign going and he was going to do everything he possibly could to see that the plant was organized. During that campaign, he wore a union committee button and a union T-shirt in the plant.

[20] See also G.C. Exh. 5(c). I note that such exhibit contains a notation that Hughey "Put Wrong Dye in a dye Run—11/16/79." Layfield gave no testimony concerning an alleged violation of the rules by Hughey on November 16, 1979, and the record fails to reveal he was warned orally or in writing at that time. As Respondent failed to offer proof that he violated the rules on that date, I attach no importance to the notation.

At the time the 1978 union campaign started, Dodson was one of two raw materials handlers in the recently relocated Scottsboro plant. In July of that year Plant Manager Foster requested that the industrial engineering department conduct a timestudy of the raw materials handler job classification. The manager of the department, Kenneth Potter, conducted the study and recommended that the department head operate with one raw materials handler and reassign some of the duties to others. Subsequently, Dodson was called to Morris' office where the supervisor informed him that his job as raw materials handler was being deleted. Prior to that time, Dodson testified he and the other raw materials handler unloaded raw materials from trucks, stored the materials in a warehouse, took raw materials to the area where they were to be used, kept a record of all materials used each day, and performed other miscellaneous tasks. When Dodson's raw materials handler position was deleted, he was told he could work as a bundle handler or as a materials handler. He chose the bundle handler position which paid 19 cents less per hour than his prior job. As a bundle handler, he did not participate in unloading trucks or perform work in the warehouse. He moved bundles to and from machines in the tufting area. While Dodson was senior to the second raw materials handler at the time, one Steve Bynum, he was not informed why Bynum was retained to perform the raw materials handling work that remained after the one position was deleted. Charges were filed with the Board alleging that Dodson was transferred for discriminatory reasons, but they were dismissed. The Union lost the Board-conducted election held at the plant in 1978.

In June 1978, Dodson filed a request for transfer back to the raw materials handler job classification. In early 1979, Steve Bynum was promoted to supervisor and Dodson was transferred back to the raw materials handler job at his old rate.

The Union commenced its 1979 organization campaign at the Scottsboro plant the first week of September 1979. At that time, Dodson was again selected as the chairman of the in-plant organizing committee. He testified without contradiction that he immediately spoke to Plant Personnel Manager Blanton and Superintendent Charles Graves and informed them they had a union campaign going and he was going to do everything he could to see the plant was organized. During the 1979 campaign, Dodson again wore a union committee button and a union T-shirt in the plant. He was the Union's observer at a Board supervised election held on December 19.

On December 3, Graves informed Dodson his job was being deleted and the main tasks would be reassigned to others.[30] Graves further informed the employee he had three options: (1) he could take a layoff; (2) he could bid other jobs that would hopefully become open; and (3) he could bump the youngest creeler mender on the yardage machine on the second shift. Dodson was given 2 days to make up his mind. According to Graves, he called Dodson to his office 2 days later and Dodson, in the presence of Graves, Blanton, and Supervisor Womack, indicated he would take the creeler mender's job on the second shift. The job was in a new department and was open because the employee who had previously occupied the position, James Scott, had moved to the number two tufting machine when the regular operator, Leonard Robinson, went to the hospital for a back operation on October 8. The creeler mender's job paid 19 cents less per hour than the raw materials handler's job which had been deleted.

On January 7, 1980, the number two tufting machine operator, Robinson, returned to work. As Dodson had only approximately 1 month on the creeler mender's job, he had no seniority rights in the department and Scott bumped back into his old job.[31] Dodson was laid off and was still in layoff status at the time of the hearing.

Robinson testified that Plant Manager Foster telephoned him at the hospital on October 9, the day after his operation, and told him when he returned to work they would have someone do lifting that might be necessary in his job. Robinson indicated Graves also telephoned him while he was in the hospital to see how he was getting along. He told neither when he intended to return to work. On December 19, Robinson appeared at the plant to vote in the election. He then told Graves and Supervisor Tommy Womack he would return to work on January 7, 1980.

Since the raw materials handler job classification was deleted on December 3, a probationary employee, Pete Bates, has unloaded trucks and stored raw materials in the warehouse. When asked to describe other work which Bates now performs, Potter indicated he did not know what else he did since his job was a sales job.

Superintendent Graves testified that in August or September he observed that Dodson was idle a considerable portion of the time while performing the raw materials handler job functions and this caused him to bring the matter to Foster's attention. Potter testified that Foster handed the job description for the raw materials handler position to him on October 22 and asked that he look it over, indicating he would get back to him. The job description in question was placed in the record as General Counsel's Exhibit 6. It is a two-page document dated June 12, 1978, which superseded an earlier job description dated November 13, 1972.[32] The job description sets forth some 22 numbered job tasks to be performed by the raw materials handler. Asterisks appear before job tasks numbered 8, 9, 12, 13, 16, 17, and 21 and lines are drawn over the words spelling out the job tasks. The following notation appears at the bottom of page 2 of the document: "These are the duties that we could remove with ease":[33] The notation was initialed by Charles Graves on October 22, the date Foster gave the document to Potter.

[30] The record reveals no other jobs were abolished at the Scottsboro plant during the 1979 organizational campaign.

[31] Respondent utilizes a system of departmental seniority. After 3 months in a job, an employee is accorded his full plantwide seniority in the department. If an employee transfers to a new department, he or she has no seniority until they have worked in the new department 3 months. When transferring to a new job in a new department, an employee has the right to transfer back to his or her former job during the 3-month probation period.

[32] As the record reveals the 1978 timestudy of the job classification was performed in June 1978, it is apparent the job description was updated at that time.

The record reveals that Foster directed Potter to conduct a timestudy of the raw materials handler job on November 7. According to Potter, the purpose of the timestudy was to ascertain whether the raw materials handler job was a full job. Potter, in turn, assigned the task to his assistant, Carolyn Williams. The basic study she conducted was placed in the record as Respondent's Exhibit 11. That document contains a description of the tasks performed by Dodson on the day of the timestudy, indicating the amount of time spent at each task. Utilizing the basic timestudy as a source document, Williams prepared a summary of the job study which was placed in the record as Respondent's Exhibit 13. According to both Potter and Graves, they got together after the preparation of the summary, which lists some 34 different job tasks performed by Dodson on the day of the study and the time it took him to perform them, and reviewed it. During that review, Graves indicated that 24 of the tasks performed on the day of the study were either unnecessary or were tasks that could more appropriately be performed by supervision, quality control personnel, creeler menders, or others.[34] Thus, while the raw timestudy showed that on the day of the study Dodson had 420.69 minutes of working time with 36.18 minutes personal, idle and fatigue time, after Potter deleted the 24 job tasks which Graves felt should be deleted from the study, the time required to accomplish the remaining 10 tasks was computed to be about 2-1/2 hours. According to Potter, it appeared to him, at that stage, that the raw materials handler job was not a full job and he recommended to Foster that the classification be abolished and that the duties be assigned to others.

When he appeared as a witness, Potter described the jobs which had been deleted for various reasons in recent years. Going back to 1975, Potter testified that during that year four job classifications were deleted. First, a fixer job and a fixer helper job were eliminated because machinery the employees fixed was moved to a different department and Respondent had fixers in the new department who could perform the duties involved. A third job designated as a grading inspector job and a fourth designated as a service operator's job were abolished in 1975, but Potter gave no reason for the action. Asked if other jobs had been eliminated before 1978,

[33] The job functions lined out by Graves and his reasons for deleting them are:

"5. . . . sign bill as acceptance for shipment." Graves testified Dodson was not an authorized agent of the Company.

"8. Obtain sample covers on each new 'lot' and then send to Quality Control." Graves testified the samples should be obtained by quality control personnel but failed to explain why.

"9. Keep supervisor informed of inventory on different types of raw materials." Graves testified Respondent has some kind of weekly report which keeps them advised. The report was not described. Additionally, he testified the creeler menders were close to the situation and would be aware of any deficiencies.

"10. . . . assist to thread up tufting machines as instructed." Graves testified the raw materials handler has never performed the job, that yardage machine operators and creeler menders do it.

"12. Cut square yard of material from each machine to insure correct weight. Inform supervisor of weight from each machine daily." Graves testified the work could be performed by creeler menders who were right at the machine, while the raw materials handler's work area was 100-125 feet away (the location of the storage area). He claimed creeler menders make other cuts and they could make one more.

"13. Cut piece of goods from each machine daily to be dyed for quality check." Graves testified the job could be done by the creeler mender.

"16. Transport barrels of spray latex to assigned storage area in Laundry." Graves testified the truckdriver delivering the product takes it to the storage area.

"17. Make up barrel of aluminum sulfate to be put in latex pit." Graves testified the function has long since been discontinued.

"21. Spot check vendors weights of raw materials." Graves testified the task should be performed by a supervisor and that Tommy Womack was performing it at the time of the hearing.

[34] The items deleted by Graves from Resp. Exh. 13 and the reasons he gave for deleting them are (items "D" and "E" appear on p. 1. The numbered items appear on p. 2 and 3):

"D. Yarn to tufting machine." Graves testified creeler menders should move yarn from the storage area to the machines as they were at the machines and knew when they needed yarn.

"E. Duck roll to tufting machine." Graves testified creeler menders should obtain it for the same reason they should obtain yarn.

"5. Transfer skids to yardage area and skids aside and stocks side by side." Graves testified the creeler menders should perform the function.

"6. Aside skids in storage area." Graves testified the work should be performed by the man who moved the yarn and the creeler mender should do it.

"7. Clear yardage area—Pick up boxes etc." Graves testified creeler menders should perform the work.

"9. Transport yarn in storage." Graves testified the work was unnecessary—it was "make-up" work.

"12. Weight check—fringe." Graves testified he felt the job should be performed by someone in supervision or responsible for quality. He then testified Bryan Wright, a supply room clerk, was performing the function at the time of the hearing.

"13. Take fringe to be checked—Sample area." Graves simply testified the supply room clerk, who also unloaded trucks and stored raw materials in the storage area, performed the functions at the time of the hearing.

"14. Put unused cones of yarn in carton." Graves said it was creeler menders' work.

"15. Get key from truck." Graves said there was no reason to take the key from the truck.

"16. Get empty box to put cones of yarn in." Graves testified the creeler menders took the yarn out and should put the cones in boxes.

"17. Help get yarn for yardage machine." Graves testified creeler menders are responsible for getting the yard for the tufting machines.

"18. Put sodium Pertonate on greasy floor." Graves testified it is the janitor's job.

"19. Transfer Yarn—Place on skid in yardage area." Graves testified it is part of the creeler menders' job.

"20. Pick up yarn off floor-storage area." Graves testified creeler menders are responsible for getting yarn from the storage area and if they drop some it is their responsibility to pick it up.

"21. Straighten boxes of yarn—Storage." Graves testified once yarn is placed in the storage area it need not be moved until used.

"23. Clear area near tufting machine." Graves testified it was work which should be performed by men at each tufting machine.

"27. Stock duck rolls in storage." Graves testified that once duck rolls are placed in storage area further handling was not necessary until it was used.

"30. Write on Box—Note." No reason for deletion given.

"31. Stock skids in storage area." Graves testified creeler menders should do the work.

"32. Aside waste, boxes, cones." No reason for deletion given.

"33. Get truck and return to stock boards." No reason for deletion given.

"34. Help work on fork-lift truck." Graves testified it was mechanics' work.

Potter replied that he recalled that a yard handler classification and a dust handler classification had been abolished. He did not provide the reason they were abolished or the date on which they were abolished. Asked what jobs other than the raw materials handler position held by Dodson were abolished in 1978, Potter indicated that four truckdriver jobs were eliminated after Respondent completed its move from its old plant to the present plant. Additionally, he recalled that a ticket printer classification in the packaging department was deleted at some unspecified time. He gave no reason for the deletion of that job. Asked what job classifications other than the raw materials handler classification were deleted in 1979, he stated a beveling operator job classification which involved three employees was eliminated as a result of an operational change. Finally, Potter testified that in 1980 a service operator classification in the packaging department was eliminated. No reason for the deletion of the job was given.

Discussion

Clearly, the pivotal issue presented by the Dodson situation is whether the raw materials handler job classification was abolished for valid reasons or whether the reasons advanced are mere pretext as contended by the General Counsel. A secondary issue, which need not necessarily be resolved if the pivotal issue is resolved in the General Counsel's favor, is whether Respondent caused Dodson to transfer to a creeler mender job knowing Robinson would return, Scott would bump back into the job, and Dodson would be laid off. For the reasons set forth below, I conclude that Dodson's union activities and his known prounion sentiments rather than valid business considerations motivated Respondent to abolish the raw materials handler job classification.

According to the scenario advanced by Respondent, Graves noticed that Dodson had idle time on his job in August or September and that caused him to recommend to Foster around October 22 that they prepare a timestudy on the job to see if it was a full 8-hour-a-day job. Graves failed to indicate how often or exactly when he observed Dodson when he was idle and he failed to indicate why, if he first observed an inactive Dodson in August or even September, he waited until October to discuss the matter with Foster. As Dodson testified without contradiction that he informed both Graves and Blanton in early September that they had a union campaign underway and he intended to do everything he could to see that the plant was organized, I strongly suspect the employee's candid discussion with Graves and Blanton triggered the decision to abolish his job. That suspicion is bolstered by the fact that General Counsel's Exhibit 6, the job description for the raw materials handler job, reveals that, before Graves gave it to Foster, who gave it to Potter, Graves lined out a number of job tasks indicating on the bottom of the document, "These are the duties that we could remove with ease." If Graves wanted the job studied to ascertain whether it was a full-time job, why the notation. The conclusion I reach is that Graves, and presumably Foster as well, since he had successfully utilized a timestudy to eliminate Dodson's raw materials handler job in 1978, decided before the job study was conducted to abolish Dodson's job.

Moving to the timestudy itself, I note that the job description indicates a major duty of the raw materials handler was to unload trucks and store the raw materials in a storage area. Or the day the study was conducted, Dodson did not perform those functions. He apparently was simply occupied, in main, in moving needed raw materials from the storage area to the machines and keeping both areas clean and uncluttered. When the raw timestudy revealed that Dodson did not have a particularly large amount of idle time the day of the study, Graves got together with Potter and told him supervision should perform some of the tasks, quality control employees should perform others, and creeler menders should perform others. Significantly, the raw materials handler job description had caused the incumbent in that job classification to perform most of the listed functions since at least June 1978, when the latest job description was issued. I attach little weight to the job study, and less weight to Graves' self-serving subjective testimony to the effect that many of the jobs deleted by him should properly be performed by others.

Finally, I note that Graves, Potter, and Foster decided to eliminate Dodson's job and cause him to take a demotion at the height of the Union's organization campaign and at the height of Respondent's own antiunion campaign which was marked by the commission of numerous instances of conduct which were violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. While Respondent sought to show that other jobs were eliminated as a result of timestudies during 1979, the only other job classification eliminated during that year was a beveling operation, and it was eliminated because the work was no longer necessary rather than as a result of a timestudy. Thus, Dodson's job was the only job eliminated after a timestudy in 1979.

In sum, the above factors cause me to conclude and find that the reasons assigned by Respondent for the elimination of the raw materials handler job classification on December 3, 1979, are pretextual. As elimination of his job classification led to Dodson's transfer to the creeler mender job and subsequently to his layoff, I find, as alleged, that the transfer and the subsequent layoff were accomplished in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act as alleged.[35]

IV. THE REPRESENTATION CASE

Or October 19, 1979, the Union filed the petition in Case 10-RC-11929. Pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election, an election was held among employees of Respondent in an appropriate unit on December 19. The Union failed to win the election and filed timely objections to the election. Or March 26, 1980, the Acting Regional Director issued a Report on [35] While the job classification was eliminated, I note that the new employee classified as a supply clerk now apparently unloads trucks, stores raw materials in a storage area, and takes samples of materials to quality control personnel. Potter's unfamiliarity with the other funcions performed by the supply clerk, as they are supposedly sales related, suggests the possibility that the supply clerk is employed full time in the performance of tasks previously performed by the raw materials handler.

Objections, in which he recommended that Objections 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, and 13 be overruled and ordered that Objections 1, 2, 3, 4, 10, 11, and 14 be resolved by an administrative law judge after hearing. The objections before me are:

OBJECTION 1:

Interrogation of its employees about their union sympathies and/or activities as well as the union sympathies and/or activities of their fellow employees;

OBJECTION 2:

Solicitation of employee grievances;

OBJECTION 3:

Threats of plant closure;

OBJECTION 4:

Threats of loss of jobs;

OBJECTION 10:

Discriminatory treatment of pro-union employee Wanda Williams [sic];

(1) By suspending her for one day on November 14, 1979.

(2) By suspending her for four days on November 19, 1979; and

(3) By discharging her on November 23, 1979.

OBJECTION 11:

Discriminatory discharge on November 28, 1979 of prounion employee Ray Hughey;

OBJECTION 14:

Interference with and destruction of the laboratory conditions required for the conduct of a representation election.

The section of this Decision entitled "The Alleged 8(a)(1) Violations" sets forth the evidence relating to Objections 1, 2, 3, and 4. As indicated there, I have found that during the period October 19–December 19, 1979, Supervisors Cameron, Blanton, Chambers, Layfield, Thompson, and Womack interrogated employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Accordingly, I recommend that Objection 1 be sustained. In the same section of this Decision, I have found that Respondent did not, through the conduct of Blanton, unlawfully solicit employee grievances. As no other evidence was offered in support of Objection 2, I find it to be without merit and recommend it be overruled. With respect to Objection 3, I have found that Supervisor Rufus Thompson unlawfully threatened employees with plant closure 2–3 days before the election. Accordingly, I recommend that Objection 3 be sustained. In section III,B,10, supra, I have found that Supervisor Tommy Womack unlawfully threatened in mid-November to fire the person behind the Union. Accordingly, I find Objection 4 is meritorious and recommend that it be sustained.

The section of this Decision entitled "The Alleged 8(a)(3) Violations" treats the unfair labor practice allegations which are coextensive with Objections 10 and 11. As there revealed, I have found that Ray Hughey was discharged by Respondent on November 28, 1979, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. I further found that employee Wanda Willmon was not suspended or discharged by Respondent in violation of the Act. Accordingly, I conclude Objection 10 is without merit and recommend it be overruled. I conclude that Objection 11 is meritorious and recommend that it be sustained.

Remaining is Objection 14. Consideration of the evidence offered in support of Objections 1, 3, 4, and 11 causes me to find that such conduct interfered with the employees' exercise of a free and untrammeled choice in the election. Accordingly, I find that Obection 14 is meritorious and recommend that it be sustained.

Having concluded that Respondent engaged in conduct during the period October 19–December 19, 1979, which interfered with the employees' exercise of a free and untrammeled choice in the election, I recommend that the results of the election held on December 19, 1979, be set aside and that a second election be conducted.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by: Interrogating employees concerning their union activities and/or the union activities and sentiments of others; requesting that employees report to it the union activities of other employees; threatening plant closure if employees selected the Union as their bargaining agent; threatening to discharge the person responsible for the Union; and intimidating an employee because he engaged in union activity.
4. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by discharging employee Ray Hughey and by transferring and subsequently laying off William Dodson because such employees joined and supported the Union.
5. Respondent has not engaged in any unfair labor practices not specifically found.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent will be required to offer Ray Hughey and William Dodson reinstatement to their former positions of employment or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, dismissing, if necessary, anyone who may have been hired to perform the work which they had been performing. Additionally, Respondent will be ordered to make these employees whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the unlawful terminations, with backpay to be computed on a quarterly basis, making deductions for interim earnings, and with interest to be paid in accordance with the Board's Decisions in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

As the unfair labor practices committed by Respondent, particularly the acts of discrimination, strike at the heart of the Act, a broad cease-and-desist order shall be recommended, precluding Respondent from "in any other manner" interfering with, coercing, or restraining employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and upon the entire record in this proceeding, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[36]

The Respondent, Fieldcrest Mills, Inc., Scottsboro, Alabama, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

(c) Intimidating employees because they engage in union activity.

(d) Discouraging membership in or activities on behalf of Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization of its employees, by discharging, transferring, or laying off employees because of their membership in or activities on behalf of the above-named or any other union.

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its place of business in Scottsboro, Alabama, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[37] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being duly signed Respondent's representative, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 10, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps it has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the consolidated complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed insofar as it alleges unfair labor practices not specifically found herein.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the election held in Case 10-RC-11929 be set aside and that a second election be directed.

[36] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[37] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Case 29-CA-8998

January 7, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

Upon a charge filed on July 6, 1981, by Local 1814, International Longshoremen's Association, AFL-CIO, herein called the Union, and duly served on Unique Handicraft Corp., herein called Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 29, issued a complaint on August 11, 1981, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge and complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on the parties to this proceeding.

With respect to the unfair labor practices, the complaint alleges in substance that on May 27, 1981, following a Board election in Case 29-RC-5202, the Union was duly certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the unit found appropriate;[1] and that, commencing on various dates since May 27, 1981, including particularly June 2 and 15 and July 8, 1981, Respondent has refused, and continues to date to refuse, to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative, although the Union has requested and is requesting it to do so. On August 20 and September 23, 1981, Respondent filed its answer and amended answer to the complaint admitting in part, and denying in part, the allegations in the complaint. Specifically Respondent admits that it refused to bargain collectively with the Union commencing on the various dates alleged in the complaint. In addition, Respondent stated by letter dated June 11, 1981, that it declined the Union's request to begin collective-bargaining negotiations on the basis of its belief that the certification of the Union is invalid.

On October 1, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment. Subsequently, on October 7, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Respondent thereafter filed a brief in opposition to the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

In its answer to the complaint Respondent affirmatively pleads that it is under no duty to recognize and bargain with the Union because the Union's certification is based upon an election which should have been set aside due to a misrepresentation by the Union and the Union's designation of an ineligible person to act as its election observer.

Respondent reiterates these contentions in its brief in opposition to the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment and essentially repeats the arguments made in its exceptions to the Regional Director's Report on Objections in the underlying representation case. The General Counsel contends that Respondent admits the material allegations of the complaint and is merely attempting to relitigate issues which were or could have been disposed of in the underlying representation case. We agree with the General Counsel.

Our review of the record, including the record in the underlying representation case (Case 29-RC-5202), reveals that pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification an election was conducted on December 5, 1980, in a unit of all warehousemen employed by Respondent at its premises located at 37-11 48th Avenue, Long Island City, New York, including packers, pickers and shipping clerks, and excluding all office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act. The tally of ballots indicated nine votes for the Union and eight votes against; there were no challenged ballots. Respondent filed timely objections alleging (1) the Union improperly designated Robert Evans as an observer since he was not an employee at the time of the election; (2) the Union distributed a letter which misrepresented the nature of a Board settlement in Case 29-CA-7986; and (3) the list of eligible employees failed to include the name of employee Robert Limehouse, an eligible employee, and Limehouse therefore was deprived of his right to vote. On January 16, 1981, the Regional Director for Region 29 issued his Report on Objections in which he overruled the Employer's objections in their entirety and recommended that a certification of representative issue. On January 23, 1981, Respondent filed with the Board exceptions to the Regional Director's report arguing that the Regional Director erred in overruling Employer's Objections 1 and 2 above because, inter alia, he failed to acknowledge that a copy of the Board's settlement notice was attached to the Union's letter. On May 27, 1981, the Board issued a Decision and Certification of Representative (not published in bound volumes) in which it adopted the Regional Director's report overruling the Employer's Objections 1, 2, and 3 above. Therein the Board specifically found no merit to the Employer's contention that the Regional Director erred by failing to refer to a Board settlement notice attached to the Union's campaign letter at issue in the Employer's Objection 2 because, if anything, the attachment reinforced the Regional Director's finding that there had been no substantial misrepresentation of the Board document. It thus appears that Respondent is attempting to relitigate matters which were or could have been heard and determined in the representation proceeding.

It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues which were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding.[2]

All issues raised by Respondent in this proceeding were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding, and Respondent does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege that any special circumstances exist herein which would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding. We therefore find that Respondent has not raised any issue which is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, operates a facility located at 47-09 30th Street in the Borough of Queens, New York, where it is engaged in the warehousing, sale, and distribution of decorative housewares and related products. During the past year, a representative period, Respondent in the course and conduct of its business operations purchased and caused to be transported and delivered to its Queens warehouse brass ornaments and related products and other goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000, of which goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 were transported and delivered to its Queens warehouse in interstate commerce directly from States of the United States other than the State of New York, and from foreign countries.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Local 1814, International Longshoremen's Association, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Representation Proceeding

1. The unit

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All warehousemen employed by the Respondent at its premises located at 37-11 48th Avenue, Long Island City, New York, including packers, pickers and shipping clerks, excluding all office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

2. The certification

On December 5, 1980, a majority of the employees of Respondent in said unit, in a secret-ballot election conducted under the supervision of the Regional Director for Region 29, designated the Union as their representative for the purpose of collective bargaining with Respondent.

The Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in said unit on May 27, 1981, and the Union continues to be such exclusive representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. The Request To Bargain and Respondent's Refusal

Commencing on various dates since May 27, 1981, including particularly June 2 and 15 and July 8, 1981, and at all times thereafter, the Union has requested Respondent to bargain collectively with it as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the above-described unit.

Commencing on various dates since May 27, 1981, including particularly June 2 and 15 and July 8, 1981, and continuing at all times thereafter to date, Respondent has refused, and continues to refuse, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative for collective bargaining of all employees in said unit.

Accordingly, we find that Respondent has, since May 27, 1981, and at all times thereafter, refused to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, and that, by such refusal, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and, upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

In order to insure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of certification as beginning on the date Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit. See Mar-Jac Poultry Company, Inc., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Commerce Company d/b/a Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817; Burnett Construction Company, 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

6. By the aforesaid refusal to bargain, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing, employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Turnbull Enterprises, Inc. and Sheet Metal Workers International Association, Local No. 11. Case 15-CA-7489

January 7, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On December 18, 1980, Administrative Law Judge J. Pargen Robertson issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief,[1] the Charging Party filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision. The Intervenor[2] also filed an answering brief to the exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, which is modified to reflect the amended remedy.

AMENDED REMEDY

The Administrative Law Judge found, and we agree, that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally discontinuing payment of contributions to the New Orleans Sheet Metal Workers Health and Welfare Fund (hereinafter referred to as the Health and Welfare Fund or the Fund) on behalf of the unit employees. To remedy this violation, the Administrative Law Judge recommended that Respondent be ordered, inter alia, to make all Health and Welfare Fund contributions, as provided in the predecessor's collective-bargaining agreement, for the period beginning on July 10, 1979, and extending until agreement on a contract encompassing a substitute insurance plan was reached by the parties on December 12, 1979;[4] to make whole employees for loss of benefits after the expiration of the coverage provided by these retroactive contributions or, at Respondent's discretion, by continuing contributions to the Fund beyond December 12 in lieu of compensating employees for loss of benefits under the Fund; and to rescind the insurance plan in effect under its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and reinstate the New Orleans Sheet Metal Workers Health and Welfare Fund plan for unit employees upon written request by the Union. The Administrative Law Judge left to the compliance stage the question whether Respondent must pay any additional amounts into the Health and Welfare Fund in order to satisfy the make-whole remedy, but specifically provided that Respondent be required to notify bargaining unit employees, as well as former employees, qualifying for benefits under this remedial scheme of their entitlement to such benefits. We agree with certain portions of the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order, but shall modify it in other respects to best effectuate an appropriate remedy under the existing circumstances.

In cases, like the one here, involving a violation of Section 8(a)(5) based on a respondent's unilaterally altering existing benefits, it is the Board's established policy to order restoration of the status quo ante to the extent feasible where there is no evidence that to do so would impose an undue or unfair burden on the respondent.[5] Because the Fund's health and welfare plan provided for 6 months' future benefits on the basis of coverage earned during the previous 6 months, and contributions had been made by Respondent's predecessor on the unit employees' behalf, the employees had accrued 6 months of advance coverage at the time that Respondent acceded to its successorship obligations and unilaterally discontinued payments to the Fund.[6] We find, therefore, that Respondent's unfair labor practice can be most appropriately remedied by placing the parties in the position in which they would have been but for Respondent's unlawful discontinuance of Fund contributions.

The remedy recommended by the Administrative Law Judge generally accomplishes this remedial objective. Thus, we agree with his recommendations regarding making employees whole for loss of benefits to the extent that costs which would have been paid by the Fund were not actually paid by

[1] Respondent's request for oral argument is hereby denied inasmuch as the record and briefs adequately state the positions of the parties.

[2] The New Orleans Sheet Metal Workers Health and Welfare Fund appeared at the hearing as the Intervenor.

[3] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[4] Unless otherwise indicated, all dates hereinafter are 1979.

[5] See, for example, Allied Products Corp., Richard Brothers Division, 218 NLRB 1246 (1975), enfd. in relevant part 548 F.2d 644 (6th Cir. 1977); Southland Paper Mills, Inc., 161 NLRB 1077, 1078 (1975).

[6] Under the terms of the plan, unit employees of the predecessor who worked at least 350 hours between January 1, 1979, and June 30, 1979, were qualified for benefits under the Fund from July 1, 1979, through December 31, 1979, regardless of whether Respondent made contributions.

the insurer under the contract, notification to all qualifying employees and former employees of their entitlement to such amounts, and reinstatement of the Health and Welfare Fund upon the Union's written request. We find, however, that the Union is most efficaciously restored to the bargaining position which it would have enjoyed but for Respondent's discontinuation of Fund contributions, not by requiring that Fund contributions be made for the period beginning July 10, 1979, and extending until December 12, 1979, as recommended by the Administrative Law Judge, but rather by the payment of retroactive contributions which will purchase 6 months of future coverage for the employees commencing from the day following receipt of the Union's request that the Health and Welfare Fund plan be reinstituted.[7] Respondent will then be required to continue payment of the currently applicable contribution rate of the New Orleans Sheet Metal Workers Health and Welfare Fund sufficient to provide continuing coverage for the unit employees until it fulfills its bargaining obligation.

In order to allow the Union an opportunity to consider whether to request the reinstatement of the Health and Welfare Fund, while not leaving the matter open indefinitely, the Union shall be required to request reinstatement within 20 days of the date of our Order herein, and if the Union does not request such reinstatement then the insurance plan in effect under the parties' current collective-bargaining agreement shall remain in effect. Once all unit employees employed by Respondent on the effective date of the reinstatement of coverage under the Health and Welfare Fund are covered by that plan, Respondent may discontinue the payment of premiums on their behalf to the insurer providing coverage under the parties' collective-bargaining agreement.[8]

In agreement with the Administrative Law Judge, we are not requiring Respondent to pay double insurance premiums by making all Health and Welfare Fund contributions for the entire period since July 10, 1979. Requiring full Fund contributions would impose an undue burden on Respondent. Further, such payments would constitute a windfall to the Health and Welfare Fund inasmuch as the insurer under the parties' collective-bargaining agreement has presumably already paid a substantial portion of the benefits to which employees would be entitled during this period.

We shall, however, order Respondent to compensate the Fund for administration costs and other expenses and loss of interest incurred by the Fund as a result of its acceptance of retroactive payments. Like the Administrative Law Judge, we shall leave the determination of these amounts to further compliance proceedings, should the Union request reinstatement of the Fund. Clerks and Checkers Local No. 1593, International Longshoremen's Association, AFL-CIO (Caldwell Shipping Company, et al.), 243 NLRB 8 (1979).[9]

Irrespective of whether the Union requests reinstatement of the Health and Welfare Fund plan, we shall adopt the Administrative Law Judge's recommendation that specific unit employees who suffered actual damage in loss of benefits be made whole by recovering those damages. In measuring actual damages, employees should be reimbursed for actual cost to the extent those costs would have been paid by the Fund minus costs which were actually paid by Respondent's insurer. However, we do not adopt those aspects of the Administrative Law Judge's recommended make-whole provision which permit Respondent to elect to make contributions to the Health and Welfare Fund in lieu of compensating employess for loss of benefits under the Fund. Rather, we shall require that employees be made whole for loss of benefits after December 31, 1979, the point at which their Health and Welfare Fund coverage ceased, and continuing to the date upon which Respondent fully complies with the terms of our Order. The amounts due shall be computed in accordance with Ogle Protection Service, Inc., 183 NLRB 682 (1970). See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

Further, since this remedy has the effect of qualifying all persons employed in the bargaining unit after July 10, 1979,[10] for benefits under the Health and Welfare Fund, we, in accordance with the recommendation of the Administrative Law Judge, shall require that Respondent take appropriate action to notify, in writing, all employees and former employees that so qualified of their entitlement to those benefits.

[7] Since the Respondent made no payments for its unit employees' insurance coverage from July 10 to December 12, erroneously assuming that it had a "six-month free ride," these amounts represent a substitution for contributions which should have been made at that time.

[8] In order to establish initial eligibility for Fund benefits, an employee must work 6 consecutive months with 700 hours of contributions to the Fund. Once the initial eligibility requirement is satisfied, employees who have 350 hours of contributions in each 6-month period remain eligible for benefits. Should any employee have been hired shortly prior to the date Fund coverage becomes effective pursuant to this remedy, such individuals might not qualify for Fund benefits until up to 6 months later. Therefore, to avoid the possibility of individuals hired under the current collective-bargaining agreement being left with no insurance coverage during this interim period, we shall require Respondent to continue to make premium payments on such individuals' behalf until such time as each qualifies for coverage under the Fund plan.

[9] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide for interest at a fixed rate on fund payments due as part of a "make-whole" remedy. We therefore leave to further proceedings the question of how much interest Respondent must pay into the benefit fund in order to satisfy our "make-whole" remedy. These additional amounts may be determined, depending upon the circumstances of each case, by reference to provisions in the documents governing the fund at issue and, where there are no governing provisions, to evidence of any loss directly attributable to the unlawful action, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of funds withheld, additional administrative costs, etc., but not collateral losses. See Merryweather Optical Company, 240 NLRB 1213, fn. 7 (1979).

The above-described remedial provisions, in our view, best eradicate the effects of Respondent's unlawful conduct by making whole employees for their resulting losses, and best restore the status quo ante by placing the Union in the bargaining position which would have obtained but for Respondent's unlawful action, without imposing an undue or unfair burden upon Respondent.[11] We shall modify the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order accordingly.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Turnbull Enterprises, Inc., Gulfport, Mississippi, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following paragraphs for paragraphs 2(a) and (b):

"(a) Make whole the employees in the appropriate unit in the manner set forth in the section of the Board's Decision and Order entitled 'Amended Remedy.'

"(b) Upon written request from the Union, and in the manner set forth in the section of the Board's Decision and Order entitled 'Amended Remedy,' rescind the current insurance plan under its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, and immediately reestablish the plan under the New Orleans Sheet Metal Workers Health and Welfare Fund by making retroactive contributions on behalf of unit employees entitling them to 6 months of future coverage commencing from the day following receipt of the Union's request, and continue such payments until such time as Respondent negotiates in good faith with the Union to a new agreement or impasse."

2. Insert the following as paragraph 2(c):

"(c) Notify, in writing, all persons employed in the bargaining unit after July 10, 1979, of their entitlement to damages for loss of benefits."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT, without prior consultation and bargaining with the Union, effect any changes in established terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the appropriate unit described below by unilaterally discontinuing payments to the Health and Welfare Fund as set forth in the collective-bargaining agreement between our predecessor and the Union.

> All production and maintenance employees, including leadpersons, electrician, janitor, plant clerical employees, tool room clerk, warehouse employees and wood fabrication employees, employed by the Employer at its Gulfport, Mississippi facility; excluding office clerical employees, draftsmen, computer operators, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by the Act.

WE WILL make employees in the above-described bargaining unit whole for losses suffered because of our unlawful action in withholding contributions on their behalf to the New Orleans Sheet Metal Workers Health and Welfare Fund.

WE WILL, upon written request from Sheet Metal Workers International Association, Local No. 11, rescind the insurance plan in effect under our collective-bargaining agreement with that Union, and will immediately reestablish the plan under the New Orleans Sheet Metal Workers Health and Welfare Fund by making retroactive contributions entitling unit employees to 6 months of future coverage commencing from the day following receipt of the Union's request, and will continue making such payments until we either bargain to a new agreement on this subject with the Union or reach a bargaining impasse.

[10] Although employees qualify by working at least 350 hours during each preceding 6-month period, the plan provides a means whereby employees may be qualified even though they did not work the full 350 hours. Therefore, all employees and former employees should receive the above-mentioned notice. Former employees qualifying for benefits under the Fund may, of course, be entitled to damages for losses incurred as much as 6 months after termination of their employment with Respondent, as the Fund plan provides for future coverage regardless of whether the individual remains employed by the contributing employer on the basis of contributions made during his employment.

[11] We agree with the Administrative Law Judge that this is not an appropriate case for the granting of attorney's fees or litigation expenses.

WE WILL notify, in writing, all persons employed in the bargaining unit after July 10, 1979, of their entitlement to damages for loss of benefits.

Turnbull Enterprises, Inc.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

J. Pargen Robertson, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard on September 22 and 23, 1980, in Gulfport, Mississippi. The charge was filed on November 14, 1979. The complaint, which issued on February 20, 1980, alleges that Turnbull Enterprises, Inc. (Respondent), as successor to a Gulfport employer whose production and maintenance employees were represented by the Sheet Metal Workers International Association, Local No. 11, Charging Party (Union), unilaterally discontinued payment of unit employee contributions to the New Orleans Sheet Metal Workers Health and Welfare Fund (Intervenor).

Upon the entire record, my observation of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel, the Charging Party, the Intervenor, and Respondent, I hereby make the following:

Findings of Fact

I. THE EVIDENCE[1]

The alleged violations arise out of a successorship situation.

During May 1975 the Union was certified as exclusive bargaining agent for unit employees[2] of Frigitemp. Subsequently, the Union and Frigitemp entered into successive collective-bargaining agreements effective from July 1, 1975, through June 30, 1978, and from July 1, 1978, through June 30, 1981. However, in 1978 Frigitemp filed a petition in bankruptcy. Thereafter, Frigitemp continued to operate its Gulfport facility as a "debtor in possession" until it was adjudicated bankrupt in May 1979. From May until July 10, 1979, a trustee appointed by the bankruptcy court operated the Gulfport facility.

The collective-bargaining agreement in effect among the above-mentioned employees of Frigitemp during 1979 provided, among other things, for Frigitemp to make contributions in accordance with an established formula to the Intervenor herein in order to provide medical, hospital, and disability benefits to unit employees.[3]

Pursuant to a bill of sale dated July 10, 1979, Respondent purchased the Gulfport facility formerly held by Frigitemp and, on or about July 17, 1979, proceeded to operate the plant with substantially the same work force. In that regard, Respondent admitted in its answer that it has since on or about July 17, 1979, operated the Gulfport facility as a successor employer within the meaning of N.L.R.B. v. Burns International Security Services, Inc., et al., 406 U.S. 272 (1972).

Several employees testified that while they were working at the plant on July 10, 1979, the employees were called into an assembly area where they were addressed by Joe Sanchez. Sanchez was employed as plant superintendent by the predecessor employer and continued in that position following the takeover by Respondent. According to the testimony, Sanchez informed the employees that the Company had been sold and that all employees were being terminated. However, Sanchez told them that the employees would be rehired.[4] Subsequently, on

[1] Respondent, which is engaged in the business of manufacturing maritime furniture at its Gulfport, Mississippi, facility, admitted the commerce allegations in the complaint. On the basis of that admission, I find that Respondent is and has been at all times material herein an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

[2] The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that the below-described unit constitutes an appropriate bargaining unit and is the unit for which the Union was certified:

> All production and maintenance employees, including leadpersons, electrician, janitor, plant clerical employees, tool room clerk, warehouse employees and wood fabrication employees, employed by the Employer at its Gulfport, Mississippi facility; excluding office clerical employees, draftsmen, computer operators, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[3] The collective-bargaining provision concerning the Health and Welfare Fund appears at art. XXX and reads as follows:

> ARTICLE XXX—Health and Welfare
> Section 1. Effective July 1, 1978, the employer shall pay monthly into the New Orleans Sheet Metal Workers' Health and Welfare Fund for the purpose of providing for the benefit of employees, their families and dependents, medical and hospital care, unemployment benefits or life insurance, disability and sickness insurance or accident insurance, under the terms and conditions of the declaration of trust of the said Fund dated January 1, 1963, a sum equal to fifty-five cents ($.55) per hour for each hour of work performed by employees covered under this Agreement, and as provided in Article VIII-A of the Standard Form of Union Agreement between Sheet Metal Workers Local Union No. 11 and Sheet Metal Contractors Association of New Orleans, Inc. and Individual Contractors who are signatory hereto effective August 1, 1977, terminating July 31, 1980.

Effective on August 1, 1978, 60 cents, effective on August 1, 1979, 65 cents, and effective on August 1, 1980, 70 cents (if applicable).

> Section 2. The failure of an individual employer to pay the above amounts or to pay to the Union monthly the dues check-off provided for in this Agreement shall constitute a breach of this Agreement, and this Agreement may, at the option of the Union, be cancelled as to any employer who is fifteen (15) days or more delinquent in making of any said payments. For the faithful performance of his obligation to make said payment, each employer hereunder within fifteen (15) days after signing of this Agreement shall post with the Union a Bond in the amount of twenty-five thousand dollars (25,000.00) for the benefit of any fund, trust or person in interest, to guarantee and secure payment of said amounts.
> Section 3. Any employer delinquent more than fifteen (15) days in the making of the above provided payment shall be charged liquidated damages of ten percent (10%) of the said payments due which shall be collectable by the party to whom the payment is due plus attorneys' fees incurred in connection with such collection in addition to the above stated sum and the payment of which shall likewise be secured by the bond provided for hereinabove.

[4] Four employees testified regarding Sanchez' remarks on July 10. Testimony of employee Frazier was that Sanchez told them that most of the employees would be called back by the new employer to do the same jobs. Employee Ladner recalled that Sanchez said that he hoped there would be more work and all the employees would be rehired. Employee Waltman recalled that Sanchez said some of the employees would be coming back—"eventually, all of us would be coming back." Employee Hickman testified that Sanchez said that all the employees would be called back in just a few days. Sanchez did not testify.

July 10, according to unrebutted testimony of employees, they were told, by supervision, to leave their toolboxes at the plant because they would be called back to work.

During the week of July 17, 1979, 68 bargaining unit employees were hired back. All 68 of those employees had previously worked for the predecessor employer. Respondent continued to reemploy former employees of the predecessor employer during the month of July. All those employees rehired during July, with the exception of four, were reemployed at the same wage rate which they had received at the time of their termination by the predecessor employer.

By telegram dated July 10, 1979, the Union made a demand upon Respondent that Respondent recognize and bargain with it concerning wages, hours, and working conditions as representative of the unit employees. The telegram was received by Respondent on July 10. By letter dated July 16, 1979, Respondent agreed to meet with the Union.

On July 16, 1979, the Union's president and business manager, Stanley Gaudet, had a telephone conversation with Respondent's president, Louis Esposito. During that conversation Esposito informed Gaudet that he was willing to sit down and discuss the contract with the Union. According to the testimony of Stanley Gaudet, he asked Esposito about the health and welfare program. According to Gaudet, Esposito replied, "I understand we have a six-month free ride." Esposito asked, "Aren't the employees covered under your health and welfare plan for the next six months?" Gaudet testified that he told Esposito, "They are covered through the end of the year, but they earn that coverage in the first six months of the year. They are earning the coverage for the first part of the next six months in this six-month period. They are always covered like six months in advance." According to Gaudet, Esposito replied, "Well, when we sit down and negotiate, if we owe you something, we will pay you at that time."[5]

Subsequently, Respondent continued to refuse to make contributions to the Health and Welfare Fund. However, Respondent met and negotiated with the Union. Although a strike occurred between November 1 and December 12, 1979, among unit employees, Respondent and the Union reached a collective-bargaining agreement on December 12, 1979. That agreement provided an insurance program for unit employees through a private carrier in replacement of the Health and Welfare Fund. The program incorporated in the parties' December 12 agreement was called "The Innovator."

The General Counsel alleges that, by unilaterally ceasing to make health and welfare contributions, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5).

II. CONCLUSIONS

Respondent admittedly was the successor employer to Frigitemp (or, more precisely, to the trustee in bankruptcy). The General Counsel contends that Respondent was obligated to negotiate with the Union as exclusive bargaining representative of unit employees before making unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment. The General Counsel argues, therefore, that Respondent, by discontinuing Health and Welfare Fund contributions for unit employees, without first negotiating with the Union, unilaterally changed a condition of employment. That argument is not founded in the predecessor's collective-bargaining agreement,[6] but in the allegation that the health and welfare provision of that agreement had become an established condition of employment. (See N.L.R.B. v. Burns International Security Services, supra.)[7]

A. The Threshold Question

Although the General Counsel finds support in Burns, supra, the Burns decision also presents the basis on which the threshold issue in this case is rooted. In Burns the successor hired a majority of its unit employees in June 1967, at wages and terms of employment which were different from those established by the predecessor employer. In fact, the successor in that case specifically told its employees when they were hired that it "could not live with" the predecessor's collective-bargaining agreement. Subsequently, on July 12, 1967, the majority union made a bargaining demand on Burns (the successor employer). The Supreme Court found that under the facts of that case the successor was free to set initial terms and conditions of employment. However, the Court went on to state:

> Although a successor employer is ordinarily free to set initial terms on which it will hire the employees of a predecessor, there will be instances in which it is perfectly clear that the new employer plans to retain all of the employees in the unit and in which it will be appropriate to have him initially consult with the employees' bargaining representative before he fixes terms. In other situations, however, it may not be clear until the successor em-

[5] I credit Gaudet's testimony. Gaudet impressed me by his demeanor. His testimony in most respects, including his testimony regarding the July 16 phone conversation with Esposito, was not denied.

[6] In addition to the above argument, the General Counsel also argues that Respondent adopted the predecessor employer's collective-bargaining agreement. I find that the evidence is insufficient to support the General Counsel in that regard.

[7] In that regard, the Supreme Court explained the Board's position in Burns, 406 U.S. at 293, 294:

> [T]he Board's opinion stated that "[t]he obligation to bargain imposed on a successor-employer includes the negative injunction to refrain from unilaterally changing wages and other benefits established by a prior collective-bargaining agreement even though that agreement had expired. In this respect, the successor-employer's obligations are the same as those imposed upon employers generally during the period between collective-bargaining agreements." App. 8–9. This statement by the Board is consistent with its prior and subsequent cases that hold that whether or not a successor employer is bound by its predecessor's contract, it must not institute terms and conditions of employment different from those provided in its predecessor's contract, at least without first bargaining with the employees' representative. . . . Thus, if Burns, without bargaining to impasse with the union, had paid its employees on and after July 1 at a rate lower than Wackenhut had paid under its contract, or otherwise provided terms and conditions of employment different from those provided in the Wackenhut collective-bargaining agreement, under the Board's view, Burns would have committed a § 8(a)(5) unfair labor practice and would have been subject to an order to restore to employees what they had lost by this so-called unilateral change.

> ployer has hired his full complement of employees that he has a duty to bargain with a union, since it will not be evident until then that the bargaining representative represents a majority of the employees in the unit as required by § 9(a) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 159(a). Here, for example, Burns' obligation to bargain with the union did not mature until it had selected its force of guards late in June. The Board quite properly found that Burns refused to bargain on July 12 when it rejected the overtures of the union. It is true that the wages it paid when it began protecting the Lockheed plant on July 1 differed from those specified in the Wackenhut collective-bargaining agreement, but there is no evidence that Burns ever unilaterally changed the terms and conditions of employment it had offered to potential employees in June after its obligation to bargain with the union became apparent. If the union had made a request to bargain after Burns had completed its hiring and if Burns had negotiated in good faith and had made offers to the union which the union rejected, Burns could have unilaterally initiated such proposals as the opening terms and conditions of employment on July 1 without committing an unfair labor practice. Cf. N.L.R.B. v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 745 n. 12 (1962); N.L.R.B. v. Fitzgerald Mills Corp., 313 F.2d 260, 272-273, 52 LRRM 2174 (C.A. 2) cert. denied 375 U.S. 834 (1963); N.L.R.B. v. Southern Coach & Body Co., 336 F.2d 214, 217 (C.A. 5, 1964). The Board's order requiring Burns to make whole its employees for any losses suffered by reason of Burns' refusal to honor and enforce the contract, cannot therefore be sustained on the ground that Burns unilaterally changed existing terms and conditions of employment, thereby committing an unfair labor practice which required monetary restitution in these circumstances. [406 U.S. at 294, 295-296.]

In the instant case unit employees were told on July 10, 1979, that the employees would be rehired. The certificates of termination of employment of unit employees stated, among other things:

> Frigitemp Marine Div. Plant #3 will cease all operations under the bankruptcy trustee effective July 10, at 3:15 p.m. (plant sold to others). Present employees may be eligible for rehire with the new company (contact personnel department).

Several employees testified that there was no mention that their terms and conditions of employment would be different under Respondent. Moreover, those employees testified that, when they started work again on July 17, they were employed at their old jobs with the same wages.[8] On July 10 employees were told that they could submit their applications for employment with Respondent when they returned on Friday, July 13, to pick up their paychecks. The employees were furnished application forms attached to the termination notices which they were given by their supervisor on July 10. Employee Ronald Ladner testified that he was assisted in completing his employment application by his supervisor (also named Ronald Ladner) and that the supervisor, in response to the employee's question as to what wage rate he should indicate that he desired on his application form, told the employee to put down what he was making with Frigitemp. Ladner also testified that when he returned to work on July 17, the employees took up theirjobs where they had left off on July 10.

The evidence regarding the size of either the predecessor's or Respondent's unit work force is incomplete. However, it is clear that there were no more than 92 unit employees employed by the predecessor employer on July 10. It is also clear that Respondent hired 68 employees during the week of July 17,[9] and all 68 of those employees were employed by the predecessor employer. The record does not show how many more employees of the predecessor employer were hired during July or, subsequently, by Respondent.

Under the circumstances, I find that the unrebutted evidence reflects that Respondent did not take action to set initial terms and conditions of employment which were different from those under the predecessor employer, before incurring an obligation to recognize and bargain with the Union. In that regard, I note, that although some of Plant Superintendent Sanchez' July 10 remarks demonstrated a question as to if, or when, all of the unit employees would be rehired, the evidence shows that Respondent's bargaining unit jobs included only former unit employees of the predecessor. Therefore, there was no question on July 10 as to the continued majority status of the Union. Moreover, the Union's demand for recognition was made by the Union and received by Respondent on July 10. Remarks by Supervisor Sanchez and Ladner during the July 10 through July 13 period led employees to believe that working conditions would not be changed. Ladner told employee Ladner that he should indicate on his employment application that he would accept the same wages he received under the predecessor employer.

Moreover, I do not view as significant Respondent's failure immediately to employ the entire bargaining unit work force of the predecessor, in view of the unrebutted evidence that Plant Superintendent Sanchez told the employees on July 10 that eventually all of the predecessor's employees would be coming back to work.

On July 11, 1979, Stanley Gaudet talked with Superintendent Sanchez. According to Gaudet's unrebutted testimony, Sanchez told him that "hopefully, all of the people would be hired back within the week or 10 days." Sanchez told Gaudet that the employees would be paid the same pay scale. Gaudet asked if the employees would be hired in seniority, and Sanchez replied that as close as he could, but that Gaudet knew that Sanchez did not like the seniority part of the contract.

[8] As indicated above, the parties stipulated that of all former employees rehired during the entire month of July 1979 only four were employed at wages different from the wages they had received under the predecessor employer. However, the evidence does not reflect that those four, or any other employees, were told on or before July 17 that the wages of the four employees would be different. The record does not reflect how many employees were hired in July. However, 68 were hired during the week of July 17. The evidence does not show that any of those 68 employees received wages different from what they had been paid by the predecessor employer.

[9] There was a 1-week hiatus in production from July 10, when the trustee ceased production, until July 17, when production was commenced by Respondent. In view of the evidence herein which demonstrates that Respondent resumed substantially the same operation with substantially the same work force and supervision, in the same plant, I do not find that the short hiatus affected Respondent's successorship role.

Gaudet testified that he had a similar conversation with Sanchez on July 13.

Therefore, the evidence reflects that all communications with the employees and their representative during the week of their termination demonstrated that the bargaining unit employees would be rehired under the same working conditions. Moreover, nothing was said to the employees which would indicate an intent by Respondent to change the terms and conditions of employment. The Board, in a similar case, held:

> In other words, there is nothing to indicate that the employees were aware of any proposed changes in employment benefits at the time Respondent expressed its intent to retain them. Accordingly, as Respondent "failed to clearly announce its intent to establish a new set of conditions prior to inviting former employees to accept employment," (Spruce Up, 209 NLRB at 195), we conclude that this case falls within the Burns exception. Consequently, Respondent was obligated to bargain with the Union before making any changes in existing terms and conditions of employment. [Charles Starbuck and Diane Starbuck d/b/a Starco Farmers Market, 237 NLRB 373, 374 (1978).]

I am convinced that the instant case falls squarely within the "perfectly clear" test outlined in Burns, supra. By its language, "[i]n other situations, however, it may not be clear until the successor employer has hired his full complement of employees that he had a duty to bargain with a union,"[10] the Supreme Court demonstrates that the underlying question in applying the "perfectly clear" test is when does the obligation to bargain arise? The evidence herein demonstrates that Respondent's bargaining obligation commenced on July 10, 1979, when the Union made its demand at a time when Respondent fully realized that its anticipated work force was represented by the Union.

Therefore, I find that from July 10, 1979, Respondent had an obligation to bargain with the Union before making unilateral changes in working conditions.

B. Respondent's Motions

During the hearing, and again in its brief, counsel for Respondent moved for dismissal. Respondent argues that the hearing should be barred by the doctrine of laches.

The allegations herein allegedly commenced during July 1979. The charges were filed on November 14, 1979. The complaint issued on February 20, 1980. Respondent argues that the hearing, which was originally scheduled for June 11, 1980, was postponed. That postponement, according to Respondent's brief, resulted from the General Counsel's staff considering an appeal by the Charging Party of the refusal of Region 15 to incorporate certain allegations of the charge into the complaint. The hearing was held on September 22 and 23, 1980. Under those circumstances, I hereby deny Respondent's motion to dismiss on the ground of laches. See Preston H. Haskell Company, 238 NLRB 943 (1978).

Respondent also argues that the complaint should be dismissed because of the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. Respondent purchased its Gulfport facility from the trustee in bankruptcy free and clear of all liens and other interests. However, despite the bankruptcy petition of Frigitemp, the trustee continued to make payments to the Health and Welfare Fund in accordance with the practice established by Frigitemp's collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. I find no merit in Respondent's contention. See Makaha Valley, Inc., 241 NLRB 300 (1979).

Respondent also contends a variance exists between the charge and the complaint, in that the charge does not allege "refusal to contribute to the [Health and Welfare] fund." The charge alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. The 8(a)(5) allegation contained in the charge broadly alleges that "on or about July 1, 1979, and at all times since that date, it, by its officers, agents and representatives, refused to bargain collectively with Sheet Metal Workers International Association, Local No. 11, a labor organization chosen by a majority of its employees in an appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment and other conditions of employment." The Board has continually held that such a charge justifies more specific allegations similar to those made by the General Counsel herein. Therefore, Respondent's motion is denied. See Griffin Inns, Owner and Operator of Sheraton Motor Inn (Woodhaven, Michigan), 229 NLRB 199, fn. 3 (1977).

Respondent also argues that it was prohibited by Section 302(c)(5) from making contributions to the Health and Welfare Fund because it was not party to a collective-bargaining agreement requiring such contributions. In Wayne's Olive Knoll Farms, Inc., d/b/a Wayne's Dairy, 223 NLRB 260, 264 (1976), the Board agreed with Administrative Law Judge Boyce's holding that Section 302(c)(5) "was aimed at practices which Congress considered inimical to the integrity of the collective bargaining process. . . . Those members of Congress who supported the amendment were concerned with corruption of collective bargaining through bribery of employee representatives by employers," and that amendment was not intended to preclude an employer's payment into a fund for the benefit of its employees, even though the collective-bargaining agreement had expired. I find the situation herein is similar to that in Wayne's Dairy. Respondent's contention in this regard is hereby rejected. See Starco Farmers Market, supra.

C. The Alleged Unilateral Change

The evidence is undisputed that Respondent failed to make contributions on behalf of its unit employees to the Health and Welfare Fund. The collective-bargaining agreement of Frigitemp required such contributions and both Frigitemp and, subsequently, the trustee made contributions in accordance with the collective-bargaining agreement until the Frigitemp operations ceased on July 10, 1979.

However, Respondent contends that the mere failure to make contributions to the Health and Welfare Fund does not qualify as a unilateral change in terms and conditions of employment. Respondent argues that the only true measure of whether its actions constitute a unilateral change is to determine what, if any, effect its actions had on employees. In that regard, Respondent contends that the employees suffered no detriment by Respondent withholding health and welfare contributions.

Respondent bases its argument on the unique character of the Health and Welfare Fund. In accordance with the Fund's plan, employees qualified for coverage under the plan during the last 6 months of 1979 by working for the predecessor employer during the first 6 months of 1979. Unit employees of Frigitemp, or the trustee, who worked at least 350 hours between January 1 and June 30, 1979, were qualified for benefits under the Fund from July 1 through December 31, 1979, regardless of whether Respondent made contributions to the plan.

Therefore, Respondent argues, since its failure to contribute would not have affected any of the employees covered until January 1, 1980, there was no change in working conditions because another plan, The Innovator, was substituted on December 12, 1979, pursuant to its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. From December 12, employees were covered under The Innovator.

However, the other parties argue that Respondent's unilateral refusal to make contributions had an impact on employees' working conditions. The Intervenor, in its brief, points to several differences between the Health and Welfare Fund's plan and The Innovator which, according to the Intervenor, unlawfully affect unit employees' working conditions.

I am persuaded that Respondent's actions unilaterally affected unit employees' working conditions. Regardless of whether The Innovator or the Health and Welfare Fund appeared to Respondent to offer more to employees, it remains the employees', not Respondent's, right to make that determination. If the employees, or their representative, determine that the Health and Welfare Fund is better suited to their needs, then the employees should have an opportunity to bargain before the Health and Welfare Fund is abandoned.

When Union President Gaudet talked to Respondent President Esposito on July 16, Esposito admitted that Respondent would not make contributions to the Health and Welfare Fund. Esposito told Gaudet, "When we sit down and negotiate, if we owe you something, we will pay you at that time."

Subsequently, the parties met and negotiated on various occasions from August through December 12, 1979. Eventually, a collective-bargaining agreement was reached on December 12.

However, Respondent refused to incorporate the Health and Welfare Fund's plan into the contract. As time wore on, during those negotiations, the total amount of contributions which Respondent had failed to make to the Health and Welfare Fund increased. That fact added to the overall cost of a potential collective-bargaining agreement and thereby placed the Union in an increasingly difficult position regarding reinstitution of the Fund's plan.

Moreover, many of the differences between the Fund's plan and The Innovator present substantive grounds for concern by employees. The evidence demonstrated that, once employees qualified under the Fund during any 6-month period by working 350 hours, that particular employee retained coverage through the following 6-month period regardless of whether his employment continued. Under The Innovator, coverage ceases if employment is terminated.

Under the Fund, appeals are considered by the Fund which includes representatives of employees. The Innovator would involve only employees of insurance companies. Additionally, the evidence showed that there are other differences between the Fund and The Innovator which could reasonably cause concern among employees.

Therefore, I find that Respondent's unilateral withholding of Fund contributions impacted unit employees' working conditions[11] and violates Section 8(a)(5).[12]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, Turnbull Enterprises, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Sheet Metal Workers International Association, Local No. 11, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. On July 10, 1979, the Union was, and has been at all times since, the exclusive bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the bargaining unit described below within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act. The appropriate bargaining unit is:

> All production and maintenance employees, including leadpersons, electrician, janitor, plant clerical employees, tool room clerk, warehouse employees and wood fabrication employees, employed by the Employer at its Gulfport, Mississippi facility; excluding office clerical employees, draftsmen, computer operators, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[12] Respondent argues in its brief that the Union acquiesced in Respondent's actions and its violations were cured by it and the Union's overall conduct. On several occasions during July, Union President Gaudet asked Respondent's representatives, Sanchez and Esposito, about making contributions to the Health and Welfare Fund. During the August 22 negotiation session, Gaudet asked Esposito to start making contributions to the Fund. During negotiations, the Union continued to negotiate toward restoration of the Fund through its November 1 strike until they finally capitulated to Respondent's demand that the Fund be replaced with an insurance company plan on December 12, 1979. Under those circumstances, I find that the Union did not acquiesce in Respondent's withholding Fund contributions. Moreover, I see nothing in either the Union's or Respondent's conduct which cured the violation. In that regard, even though Esposito told Gaudet on July 16, "If we owe you something, we will pay you," I note that Fund contributions were never made.

4. Respondent, by unilaterally withholding contributions on behalf of unit employees to the Health and Welfare Fund, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(l) and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. Since the appropriate remedy for Respondent's unilateral action in discontinuing contributions to the Health and Welfare Fund is to reinstate the status quo ante, I recommend that Respondent make whole the employees in the unit by making all Health and Welfare Fund contributions, as provided in the predecessor's collective-bargaining agreement, which have not been paid for the period beginning on July 10, 1979, and extending until agreement was reached on December 12, 1979.[13] Starco Farmers Market, supra; Joe Costa Trucking, supra. Backpay shall be computed in accordance with Ogle Protection Service, Inc. and James L. Ogle, an Individual, 183 NLRB 682 (1970).[14]

Additionally, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to reinstate the Health and Welfare Fund plan for unit employees, upon written request by the Union. I am convinced that reinstatement of the plan is warranted in view of testimony from Gaudet and Hernandez, which I credit, that they were told during negotiations, by Plant Manager Kolkmeyer, that he (Kolkmeyer) did not want the Fund because the Fund tied the employees too close to the Union. On direct, Kolkmeyer denied that he told the Union that he did not want the Fund because it tied the employees to the Union, but he did testify that he objected to the Fund because it was controlled by the Union. Later, on direct, Kolkmeyer admitted that he could have used the phrase "tied in" in referring to the Union having control. Moreover, on cross by the General Counsel, Kolkmeyer was asked to explain precisely what it was about union control that bothered him. Kolkmeyer's response to the General Counsel's questions revealed that the source of his concern was the Union's, rather than Respondent's, contact with employees during the Fund's administration. In view of Kolkmeyer's testimony and the testimony of Gaudet and Hernandez and employee Eugene Frazier, I am convinced that Respondent found the Fund objectionable because of the opportunities it presented for the employees to maintain close contact with their Union. I am also persuaded that Kolkmeyer told the Union and employees on the union negotiating committee that he did not want the Fund because the Fund tied the employees too close to the Union. In view of the above evidence regarding Respondent's motivation in rejecting the Fund, and in view of the obvious harmful effect Respondent's illegal discontinuation of the Fund contributions had on reinstitution of the Fund during negotiations, I am persuaded that the Fund must be instituted by Respondent in order fully to restore the status quo ante. Bastian-Blessing, Division of Golconda Corporation, 194 NLRB 609, 614 (1971).

Since this remedy would have the effect of qualifying all persons employed in the bargaining unit during the period beginning July 10, 1979,[15] for benefits under the Health and Welfare Fund, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to take appropriate action to notify, in writing, all employees, and former employees that so qualified, of their entitlement to those benefits.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record in this case, and pursuant to [13] Even though I have recommended below that Respondent be required to reinstate the Fund plan for unit employees, I have limited direct reimbursement to the date the parties agreed to a collective-bargaining agreement (December 12, 1979). Since the employees were covered both under The Innovator and, in accordance with my recommendations herein, the Fund, until July 1, 1980, and subsequently, by The Innovator alone, I find no justification for a broad order requiring what would constitute double premiums and coverage from December 12, 1979. However, if compliance proceedings are necessitated, the General Counsel may, upon showing that specific unit employees suffered actual damage in loss of benefits at some point after June 30, 1980, recover those damages in the form of backpay to the particular employee involved; provided, however, that Respondent may, at its discretion, elect to continue contributions to the Fund beyond December 12, 1979, in lieu of compensating employees for loss of benefits under the Fund. See Merryweather Optical Company, 240 NLRB 1213 (1979). However, Respondent's election to contribute to the Fund or reimburse employee losses shall not affect the Fund's right to additional amounts. See fn. 14 below. In measuring actual damages, employees should be reimbursed for actual cost to the extent those costs would have been paid by the Fund minus costs which were actually paid by Respondent's insurance.

Although unit employees struck Respondent on November 1, 1979, the evidence does not establish a basis for terminating Respondent's obligation to make Health and Welfare Fund contributions at that time. Even if an impasse existed on November 1, Respondent took no action at that time which was consistent with its rejected offers to the Union. The record failed to prove that Respondent instituted The Innovator plan for unit employees until December 12, 1979, when it reached agreement with the Union. Falcon Tank Corp., 194 NLRB 333 (1971).

I find no basis to grant litigation expenses herein. I do not view Respondent's defenses to be "patently frivolous." Although a case may be made that the issues herein are not "dependent upon resolutions of credibility" (Heck's Inc., 215 NLRB 765 (1974)), the Board in Heck's did not imply that the "credibility" test was the exclusive measure in determining whether to award litigation expenses. Other questions are present here, including especially those arising because of the unique nature of the Fund's 6-mouth provisions, which give rise to "debatable" issues.

[14] See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). In accord with Merryweather Optical Company, supra, I recommend against the addition of interest at a flat rate, at this, the adjudicatory stage, on these unlawfully withheld fund payments. It should be left "to the compliance [stage] the question whether Respondent must pay any additional amounts into the [Health and Welfare Fund] in order to satisfy [this] 'make-whole' remedy. These additional amounts may be determined . . . by reference to provisions in the documents governing the [F]unds at issue and, where there are no governing provisions, to evidence of any loss directly attributable to the unlawful withholding action, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of the funds withheld, additional administrative costs, etc., but not collateral losses." Merryweather Optical Company, supra, 240 at 1216, fn. 7. In computing such amounts, the basis for computation would run from July 10, 1979, to the date upon which Respondent fully complies with the terms of this recommended Order.

[15] Although employees qualify by working at least 350 hours during each preceding 6-month period, the plan provides a means whereby employees may qualify even though they do not work the full 350 hours. Therefore, all employees and former employees should receive the above-mentioned notice.

Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[16]

The Respondent, Turnbull Enterprises, Inc., Gulfport, Mississippi, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Unilaterally changing established terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the bargaining unit for failing to contribute to the Health and Welfare Fund established by the predecessor employer's collective-bargaining agreement with the Union in derogation of the bargaining obligation imposed by the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed by the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Make whole the employees in the appropriate unit in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Upon written request from the Union, and in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy," rescind the current plan under its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, and immediately reestablish the plan under the New Orleans Sheet Metal Workers Health and Welfare Fund.

(c) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records relevant or necessary to facilitate the determination of the amounts due to employees under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Gulfport, Mississippi, place of business copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[17] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 15, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuos places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director for Region 15, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

[16] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided by Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[17] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry, Local Union No. 741 and The Ashton Company, Inc. and Laborers' International Union of North America, Local No. 479. Case 28-CD-195

January 7, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

Upon a charge filed on June 25, 1980, by The Ashton Company, Inc., herein called the Employer, and duly served on United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry, Local Union No. 741, herein called Respondent or the Plumbers, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 28, issued a complaint on August 6, 1981, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(D) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge and complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on the parties to this proceeding.

With respect to the unfair labor practices, the complaint alleges in substance that Respondent violated the Act by picketing the Employer's American Smelting and Refining Company (ASARCO) Mission Mine Unit jobsite from about May to about August 7, 1980, with an object of forcing or requiring the Employer to assign the work of installing all process piping, including water, air, slurry, mill water, reagent, and line slurry piping, at the ASARCO Mission Mine Unit project to employees represented by it rather than to employees represented by Laborers' International Union of North America, Local No 479, AFL-CIO, herein called called the Laborers. The complaint further alleges that Respondent has failed and refused to abide by the Board's July 1, 1981, Decision and Determination of Dispute,[1] which awarded the disputed work to employees represented by the Laborers, by failing and refusing to notify the Regional Director for Region 28, in writing within 10 days, whether it would comply with the award, as required thereby. On August 17, 1981, Respondent filed its answer to the complaint admitting in part, and denying in part, the allegations in the complaint and asserting as an affirmative defense that at all times its picketing was merely for the purpose of seeking compliance with an award issued by the Impartial Jurisdictional Disputes Board of the Building and Construction Trades Council of the AFL-CIO, herein called the IJDB, awarding employees represented by Respondent the disputed work, and that the Board's refusal to apply that award and quash the 10(k) notice of hearing was erroneous as a matter of fact and law.

On September 21, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a motion to transfer and continue the matter before the Board, for summary judgment, and to strike denials in Respondent's answer. The General Counsel submits, in substance, that Respondent is not entitled to a hearing de novo on issues which where raised and litigated in the underlying 10(k) proceeding, that Respondent's answer admits that Respondent is failing and refusing to accede to and abide by the Board's Decision and Determination of Dispute in that proceeding, and that Respondent is seeking to relitigate those issues. The General Counsel further submits that the Board should strike Respondent's answer to the extent that it seeks to deny the alleged object of its picketing activities. Subsequently, on September 28, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's motions should not be granted. Respondent thereafter filed a response to the Notice To Show Cause and a Motion for Summary Judgment in favor of Respondent and memorandum in support of that motion. In its response, Respondent essentially reiterates its contention that the Board erroneously refused to quash the 10(k) notice of hearing, and urges that the Board should reconsider and overturn the underlying 10(k) award. Respondent further asserts that the General Counsel's motion to strike should be denied, as the parties stipulated that the purpose of the picketing was to protest the Employer's refusal to implement the IJDB award, and therefore its denial of the complaint's allegation that an object of the picketing was to force or require the Employer to assign work to employees represented by it is correct and appropriate.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, including the record in the underlying 10(k) proceeding,[2] the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motions To Strike and for Summary Judgment

Review of the record in this proceeding, and of the record in the underlying 10(k) proceeding, indicates that a hearing was held pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, at which all parties appeared and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to adduce evidence bearing on the issues. On July 1, 1981, the Board issued its Decision and Determination of Dispute, finding, inter alia, the existence of a jurisdictional dispute involving Respondent and the Laborers, that an object of Respondent's picketing was to force or require the Employer to assign the work in dispute to employees represented by Respondent, and that reasonable cause existed to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act had been violated. The Board also found that the result of the proceeding before the IJDB was not controlling, as Respondent had contended.[3] After due consideration of the relevant factors, the Board awarded the disputed work to employees represented by the Laborers, and determined that Respondent was not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force or require the Employer to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it. The Board further ordered Respondent to notify the Regional Director for Region 28, in writing within 10 days from the date of the award, whether it would refrain from engaging in proscribed conduct.

By its denials in its answer to the complaint and by its response to the Notice To Show Cause and Motion for Summary Judgment in favor of Respondent, Respondent seeks to place in issue the Board's finding in the 10(k) proceeding that an object of its picketing was to force or require the Employer to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it. In support of its position, Respondent argues that the sole purpose of the picketing was to obtain compliance with the IJDB decision awarding the work to employees represented by it,[4] and therefore its denial that the picketing was for an object proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act is not an attempt to relitigate matters previously decided. To picket to force the Employer to comply with an IJDB award assigning employees represented by Respondent the work, however, is in fact picketing to force the Employer to assign the work to employees represented by Respondent. Thus, we conclude that Respondent is in effect seeking to relitigate issues settled in the 10(k) proceeding. This it cannot do, as it is well settled that issues raised and litigated in a 10(k) proceeding may not be relitigated in a subsequent unfair labor practice proceeding alleging violations of Section 8(b)(4)(D) which are based in part on factual determinations made in the 10(k) proceeding.[5] Accordingly, we grant the General Counsel's motion to strike the denials in Respondent's answer relating to this issue.

We found in the 10(k) proceeding, on the basis of undisputed evidence, that the Plumbers picketed at the Employer's ASARCO Mission Mine jobsite from May 5 until approximately August 7, 1980, with signs stating that the Employer was refusing to comply with the IJDB's work assignment award, that the Plumbers had previously sent a telegram to the Employer demanding that it implement the IJDB award, and that at various times, as a result of the picketing, craft employees of the Employer stopped working and there were interruptions in deliveries to the Employer by third-party suppliers not involved in the dispute. We further found that an object of the Plumbers' picketing was to force or require the Employer to assign the disputed work to employees represented by the Plumbers. On this basis we found reasonable cause to believe that Respondent had violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act. Since this undisputed evidence is neither supplemented nor controverted in this proceeding, we here find that the preponderance of evidence establishes that Respondent picketed the ASARCO Mission Mine jobsite with an object of forcing or requiring the Employer to assign the work in dispute to employees represented by Respondent, and that by such conduct it violated Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(D) of the Act.

Respondent's answer admits the allegation that it has failed and refused to accede to and abide by the work assignment and order of the Board by failing and refusing to notify the Regional Director for Region 28, in writing, whether it will refrain from forcing and requiring the Employer, by means proscribed by Section 8(B)(4)(D) of the Act, to assign the work in a manner inconsistent with the Board's determination. Compliance with a 10(k) award requires a good-faith intent by the particular respondent to accept and abide thereby, including a timely and unequivocal written statement to the Regional Director indicating such an intent, as is required by the 10(k) award.[6] Respondent has completely failed to notify the Regional Director of its intent to abide, or not to abide, by the 10(k) award, a lack of expression which clearly does not manifest the required good-faith intent to abide by the Board's determination. In these circumstances, having found on the basis of undisputed evidence that Respondent had demanded the disputed work, and that it has not expressed a good-faith intent to abide by the Board's resolution of the dispute in the 10(k) proceeding, we infer that Respondent has not abided thereby and has continued to demand the disputed work. Thus, there being no issues properly litigable in this proceeding, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment. Respondent's Motion for Summary Judgment in its favor is accordingly denied.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

Findings of Fact

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER

The Employer, an Arizona corporation with its principal place of business in Tucson, Arizona, is engaged in business as a construction contractor. During the past year, the Employer purchased goods from directly outside the State of Arizona having a value in excess of $50,000.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that the Employer is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry, Local Union No. 741, and Laborers' International Union of North America, Local No. 479, AFL-CIO, are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background and Facts of the Dispute

At all times material hereto, Respondent and the Laborers have had a jurisdictional dispute concerning the work of installing all process piping, including water, air, slurry, mill water, reagent, and line slurry piping, at the Employer's ASARCO Mission Mine Unit jobsite in Sahuarita, Arizona. From about May 5 to about August 7, 1980, Respondent picketed the ASARCO Mission Mine Unit jobsite with an object of forcing or requiring the Employer to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it. In so doing, Respondent induced or encouraged employees of Ashton and its suppliers to engage in a strike or a refusal in the course of their employment to use, manufacture, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities, or to perform services, and has threatened, coerced, and restrained the Employer and other persons engaged in commerce or in industries affecting commerce, with an object of forcing or requiring the Employer to assign the disputed work to employees represented by Respondent, rather than to employees represented by the Laborers.

B. The Determination of the Dispute

On July 1, 1981, the Board issued a Decision and Determination of Dispute (256 NLRB 1022) finding that employees represented by the Laborers are entitled to perform the disputed work, and that Respondent was not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force or require the Employer to assigned the work to employees represented by it.

C. Respondent's Refusal To Comply

By failing and refusing to notify the Regional Director for Region 28, in writing, of its intent to comply with the above-mentioned Decision and Determination of Dispute, Respondent has not complied with the award and has continued to demand the disputed work.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with the operations of the Employer described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(D)(i) and (ii) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Tera Advanced Services Corporation and Daniel J. Malloy. Case 5-CA-11973

January 7, 1980

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On March 31, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Arthur Leff issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, counsel for the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent filed an answering brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge only to the extent consistent herewith.

We agree with the Administrative Law Judge that the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected activity was a motivating factor in Respondent's decision to discharge employee Daniel Malloy. Contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, however, we do not find that Respondent has met its burden of establishing that it would have taken the same action even in the absence of Malloy's protected activity. We find, in agreement with the General Counsel, that Malloy's protected activity was the sole motivating factor in the decision, and that Respondent's other asserted reasons for the discharge were pretexts.

The record discloses that during his tenure of employment Malloy unquestionably had an inconsistent performance record, marked by several warnings concerning below-average attitude and productivity. In January 1980,[1] Supervisor George Petrov placed Malloy on probation after finding him to be the least accurate employee of his five-member coding team. Malloy was given a final warning after an evaluation on January 25 rated his performance below average. On Friday, February 1, however, Petrov found Malloy's most recent work acceptable, and concluded that a previous warning about socializing on the job had made an impression on him. Operations Manager Michael Seville approved Petrov's recommendation that Malloy's probationary period be extended and that no further action be taken against him at that time.

The Administrative Law Judge found that the "paycheck incident" also occurred on February 1, when employee Linda Robb, an assistant to Administrative Manager Dee Denton, handed Malloy his paycheck and W-2 form. Upset that the form did not contain his correct address, Malloy exclaimed, "Those dumb fuckers up front, they never do anything right. I ought to go up and kick Dee's ass." Although Robb immediately informed Denton of the incident, it is undisputed that Project Manager James Long, Respondent's top management official, did not learn of it until February 4.

On Monday, February 4, Respondent held a "brown bag" lunch at which Long addressed approximately 25 employees concerning Respondent's operations. During a question-and-answer session following the address, Malloy asked what management's attitude would be toward the formation of a company union. Long was visibly upset by the question and indicated that he did not think a union was necessary. Malloy then stated that a union would enable employees to bargain for wage increases, and, after another employee noted the advantages of unionization, Malloy related his understanding of how collective bargaining operated at another location.

Immediately after the brown bag lunch, Long met with Denton and Seville and said, "[w]ho the hell does he think he is, asking to form a union at TERA." With Denton urging that Malloy be fired, Long then stated, "[g]ive me his file, his personnel file, give me Dan Malloy's personnel file. I have had it. I have had it." The Administrative Law Judge found that at some point during this conversation Denton informed Long about the paycheck incident. The Administrative Law Judge also found that Long decided to discharge Malloy sometime during the afternoon of February 4. On February 5, Long informed Data Manager Barbara Murray that he was discharging Malloy, and he instructed her to prepare a memorandum on Malloy's employment history. Long also instructed Supervisor Petrov to submit his recommendation, but in a memorandum Petrov observed that Malloy "has a point in maintaining that dismissal at this time is not justified," since his current work was sufficiently accurate and since he had not recently been a disruptive influence. Nonetheless, Long discharged Malloy at the close of business on February 5.

In finding that Respondent met its burden of demonstrating that it would have discharged Malloy even in the absence of his protected activity, the Administrative Law Judge relied, to a large extent, on Malloy's behavior during the paycheck incident. Contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, we find that Respondent has failed to demonstrate that it relied on this incident as a basis for the decision.

We note initially that the Administrative Law Judge did not pinpoint the precise time at which the discharge decision was made, finding only that Long arrived at his decision sometime "on the afternoon of February 4." We find merit to the General Counsel's contention that Long decided to discharge Malloy at the precise moment that he demanded Malloy's personnel file and declared that he had "had it," during the conversation with Denton and Seville following the brown bag lunch. Our finding in this regard is grounded in the circumstances in which the remarks were made. Thus, Malloy's comments had caused Long to be visibly upset both during and after the brown bag lunch. Long's remarks were made immediately after Malloy had engaged in protected conduct, and the decisive manner in which they were uttered indicated that a final disposition of the issue was forthcoming. In these circumstances, Long's demand for the file and his declaration that he had "had it" cannot be interpreted as manifesting anything other than a firm resolve to discharge Malloy.

The Administrative Law Judge also found that Denton informed Long of the paycheck incident for the first time during the course of this same conversation, but again he did not specify the precise time at which Denton did so. He found only that Long "may" have been informed prior to demanding Malloy's personnel file and declaring that he had "had it." After a careful review of the record, we find no evidence that Long had been apprised of the paycheck incident prior to that moment, which, as we have found, was the moment at which the discharge decision was made. Therefore, since Respondent has not established that Long was aware of the paycheck incident at that time, it has not demonstrated that the incident was a motivating factor in the decision to discharge Malloy.[2]

The Administrative Law Judge also found that, in deciding to discharge Malloy, Respondent relied on Malloy's "probationary status, failure to sustain an acceptable level of performance, and other problems Respondent had had with him as an employee."[3] For the reasons below, we also find that Long did not consider these factors at the time he made his decision.

While it is undisputed that Malloy had an inconsistent performance record, it is also established that on Friday, February 1, Respondent had decided to extend Malloy's probationary period after his supervisor, Petrov, had judged his most recent work acceptable and had noted that a previous warning about socializing had made an impression on him.[4] In these circumstances, we cannot find that Malloy's performance, which had been found sufficiently acceptable to warrant an indefinite extension of his probationary period on February 1, suddenly formed a part of the basis for the decision to discharge him only 3 days later. The recent extension of the probationary period also precludes a finding that Respondent relied on Malloy's continuing probationary status in making its decision. Moreover, the record discloses no evidence that Long considered Malloy's performance problems or probationary status at the time he stated that he had "had it" during his conversation with Seville and Denton. On the contrary, the evidence indicates only that Malloy's comments about unionization were discussed at the moment that Long made his decision.

Consideration must also be given to the fact that much of the evidence used to justify the discharge was not gathered until the day after the decision was made. As the Administrative Law Judge found, Long informed Murray of his decision on the morning of February 5 and instructed her to prepare a memorandum setting forth everything she knew about Malloy. It was this memorandum which labeled Malloy's performance record as "generally unacceptable," noted his "sloppy handwriting," asserted that he had abused compensatory time and other privileges, and observed that he had engaged in excessive socializing. We do not suggest that Long was completely unaware of Malloy's performance and other miscellaneous problems until February 5. However, the fact that Long ordered the preparation of the memorandum after the decision had been made, when coupled with the absence of evidence that these problems were considered at the time of the decision, indicates that Respondent offered the problems listed in the memorandum as mere afterthoughts.

[2] The Administrative Law Judge credited Long's testimony that he would have discharged Malloy upon learning of the paycheck incident, even in the absence of the protected activity. We find that the Administrative Law Judge's credibility resolution in this regard is of no consequence, since it has not been established that Long knew of the paycheck incident at the time he decided to discharge Malloy. In discerning an employer's motive for a disciplinary action, we analyze only those factors which the employer considered at the time the action was taken. Whether an employee would have been discharged for conduct occurring after the disciplinary decision, or for conduct of which the employer was not apprised until after the decision, is speculative and is not relevant to our inquiry.

[3] In using the phrase "other problems," the Administrative Law Judge was apparently referring to the items listed in Supervisor Murray's memo of February 5, discussed infra.

[4] In this connection we also note Long's testimony that in the absence of the paycheck incident, which has not been shown to be a motivating factor, he would not have disturbed the decision of February 1 to extend Malloy's probationary period.

Finally, the Board has traditionally viewed the timing of a discharge as one element to be weighed in discerning an employer's motivation.[5] Here the decision to discharge Malloy was made immediately after he had raised the issue of unionization at the brown bag lunch. Long's decisive response to Malloy's comments, when viewed in conjunction with the preceding onsiderations, suggests that Respondent would not have discharged Malloy in the absence of his protected activity.

In view of the foregoing, we find that Respondent's asserted reasons for discharging Malloy were pretexts, and that it discharged him solely because he spoke out in favor of unionization. Accordingly, we find that by discharging Malloy Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent TERA Advanced Services Corporation is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By discharging Daniel J. Malloy because of his union activities, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

3. The aforesaid unfair labor practice affects commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in an unfair labor practice in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that Respondent cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. Accordingly, we shall order Respondent to offer Daniel J. Malloy immediate and full reinstatement to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and to make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against him by paying to him a sum equal to what he would have earned, less any net interim earnings, plus interest. Backpay shall be computed in accordance with the formula set forth in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon to be computed in the manner described in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[6] In accordance with our decision in Hickmott Foods, Inc., 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), we shall also provide for a narrow cease-and-desist order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, TERA Advanced Services Corporation, Bethesda, Maryland, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

Malloy immediate and full reinstatement to his former position, or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any losses incurred by reason of the discrimination practiced against him, in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its Bethesda, Maryland, facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 5, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

TERA ADVANCED SERVICES CORPORATION

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ARTHUR LEFF, Administrative Law Judge: Upon a charge filed by Daniel J. Malloy on February 27, 1980, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 5, issued a complaint, dated April 18, 1980, against TERA Advanced Services Corporation, Respondent herein, alleging that Respondent had engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act by terminating the employment of the Charging Party on February 5, 1980. Respondent filed an answer denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices. A hearing on the complaint was held before me at Washington, D.C., on October 9 and 10, 1980. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel, Respondent, and the Charging Party on December 1, 1980.

Upon the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the parties, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent, a California corporation, is engaged at its Bethesda, Maryland, facility—its only facility involved herein—in providing techinical services to government agencies. During the 12-month period preceding the issuance of the complaint, Respondent received in excess of $50,000 for services provided by its Bethesda facility for customers located outside the State of Maryland. Respondent admits that it is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and it is so found.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Introduction; the Issues

As indicated above, the central issue in this case is whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by its discharge on February 5, 1980, of Daniel J. Malloy, an employee at its Bethesda, Maryland, facility. The complaint alleges more specifically that Respondent discharged Malloy because he engaged in protected concerted activity by attempting to interest fellow employees in union representation.

Respondent employs approximately 100 employees at its Bethesda facility. The employees have never been represented by any union and, so far as appears, no union effort has ever been made to organize them. The General Counsel makes no claim that Malloy at any time engaged in any activity to interest employees to seek union representation other than by his conduct at the meeting described below.

As will hereinafter be more fully detailed, on Monday, Feburary 4, 1980, Project Manager James A. Long, Respondent's top management official at its Bethesda facility, had a "brown bag" lunch meeting with some 25 employees of the facility to give them an overview of Respondent's national operations. At the conclusion of his address, Long invited questions from the employees about anything they wanted to talk about. Malloy asked Long how management would react to the formation of an employee union at the facility and also made certain comments indicating the desirability of having differences between management and employees relating to terms and conditions of employment resolved through the collective-bargaining process. Respondent discharged Malloy on Tuesday, Feburary 5, the day following the meeting. The General Counsel's basic position in this case is that Respondent's discharge action was motivated by Malloy's question and comments at the meeting; that Malloy's conduct in that respect constituted protected concerted activity; and that, consequently, Respondent's discharge action must be ruled violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

Respondent does not dispute that Malloy asked the question and made the comments referred to above, but otherwise takes issue with the General Counsel's position in all respects. According to Respondent, Malloy's question and comments at the "brown bag" lunch played no role whatsoever in the discharge decision which was implemented on February 5. Respondent asserts that its discharge determination was based exclusively upon the following in combination: (1) Malloy's failure to sustain an acceptable level of performance (along with related considerations such as his poor attitude and excessive socializing) during the period of his employment, and (2) his profane outburst before a female employee on the Friday before his discharge when given a paycheck and a W-2 form containing a wrong addreess, the details of which will be reported below. Respondent further asserts that its determination to fire Malloy at the time it did was sparked, not by Malloy's conduct at the "brown bag" lunch, but by the paycheck incident which, according to Respondent, was first brought to the attention of Long, who made that determination, shortly after the conclusion of the "brown bag" lunch. Respondent insists that it would have taken the action it did, at the time it did, and for the reasons it did, whether or not Malloy had asked the question and made the comments claimed by the General Counsel to have been the cause of the discharge.

With the respective positions of the parties thus clarified, I now turn to a more detailed consideration of the relevant facts as reflected by the evidence in this record that I find credible.

B. The Relevant Facts

1. Malloy's work history

Malloy was employed by Respondent from September 25, 1978, until his discharge on February 4, 1980, at its Bethesda, Maryland, facility, where Respondent is engaged in processing documents and performing related work for the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. Except for a brief period when he was assigned to quality control work, Malloy's job throughout his employment was that of a coder; his function as such was to review documents, extract certain data elements therefrom, and report them on a coding form. Malloy's immediate supervisor during the last 3 months of his employment was George Petrov. Above Petrov in the supervisory chain of command over Malloy were Barbara Murray, the data manager, and Michael Seville, the operations manager, in that order. As earlier noted, James A. Long, now also a vice president of Respondent, was the project manager and top management official at the Bethesda facility.

Respondent's evaluation records of Malloy, which are in evidence, support Respondent's contention that Malloy had a history of inconsistent and at times substandard performance during the period of his employment. On his first evaluation in late January 1979, he was rated below average in productivity, average in attitude, and given a warning. About a week later, he was told he was being terminated because of low productivity, but that action was later rescinded when it was determined that the statistics relating to his productivity had been inaccurately compiled. Several weeks later, his work was reevaluated and his performance was found to be acceptable. On May 15, 1979, he was rated average in all respects and given a salary increase of $1,000 per annum. The May evaluation report notes that he had been moved to a quality control position because of the high quality of encoding work he had demonstrated, and that he performed well in quality control. It appears that Malloy worked in quality control until September and then was transferred back to his previous position as a coder because due to an injury he was working only a 25-hour week at that time and Respondent wanted a full-time employee in his quality control position. On July 10, 1979, Malloy was rated below average in productivity and attitude, and it was noted that his inconsistent performance was again a problem; that he seemed to respond to corrective counseling, but only for short periods, and that he occasionally demonstrated a negative attitude. A followup review was scheduled for August, but apparently was not conducted. So far as appears, no further review or evaluation of Malloy's work was thereafter made until January 1980. Malloy testified without contradiction that during the intervening period no management representative criticized the quality of his work.

In early or mid-January of 1980, Petrov reviewed the work of his five-member coding team and found Malloy to be the least accurate member of the team. At that time, Petrov directed Malloy's attention to the fact that he was making too many mistakes. At about that time, Petrov also discussed Malloy's situation with his supervisors, Murray and Seville. A consensus was reached to give him a warning and put him on probation for a 2-or 3-week period to see whether there was any improvement in his work. Toward that end, a formal review and evaluation of Malloy's work was conducted on January 25, 1980. Malloy's performance was rated below average. Petrov and Seville were instructed to give Malloy a "final warning." A followup was scheduled for February 1.[1]

On Friday, February 1, Petrov again reviewed Malloy's work. Petrov, as appears from his testimony, found that the coding forms which Malloy had most recently produced, but which he had not theretofore seen, were acceptable. Petrov also had a conversation with Malloy that day about Malloy's socializing on the job and Malloy assured him that he would "maintain a more professional attitude in the future." Petrov concluded that the warning and "stern talk" given Malloy had made an impression on Malloy, and that Malloy should be given a further chance before any adverse action was taken against him. Accordingly, Petrov recommended to Seville, the facility's operations manager, that Malloy's probationary period be extended and that no further action be taken against him at that time. Seville concurred, and approved Petrov's recommendation.[2]

[1] The January 25, 1980, evaluation report, in addition to referring to the "poor quality" of Malloy's work, also states that his "attitude" was presenting a "serious problem." The only specific evidence presented by Respondent to support that assertion was Petrov's testimony that during that period he was also concerned about Malloy's excessive socializing on the job and the disruptive effect that this was having on the work of other employees.

2. The paycheck incident

On Friday, February 1, Linda Robb distributed to the facility's employees their paychecks, along with their W-2 forms. Robb was then an assistant to Delores Denton (Dee), the administrative manager of the facility's records office where payroll and like personnel records are prepared and maintained. Robb delivered to Malloy his check and W-2 form shortly before noon that day. Malloy's W-2 form contained an address no longer applicable to him. About 2 months before, Malloy had moved to a new address. He had twice requested Denton to have his address changed on Respondent's records, but this had not been done.

Malloy's back was to Robb when she laid his check and W-2 form on his desk. As Robb was turning to leave, Malloy picked up the envelope containing the W-2 form, observed the wrong address, and blurted out in a loud voice: "Those dumb fuckers up front, they never do anything right. I ought to go up and kick Dee's ass."[3] Robb testified that Malloy was looking down at the W-2 form and not at her when he made that exclamation. According to Malloy, his exclamation was simply a spontaneous outburst of irritation and was not addressed to Robb or anyone else. Respondent offered no evidence that any employee other than Robb heard or reacted in any way to Malloy's outburst. There is no indication in the record that Malloy was given to cursing on the job. Malloy's testimony that, except on this one occasion, he had never cursed in the office was not challenged by Respondent at the hearing.

Robb testified that she was "shocked" by the language Malloy had used as well as the tone of his voice. After completing her distribution of paychecks, Robb reported the incident to Denton. Shortly thereafter, Denton came to Malloy's desk and angrily told him that she did not appreciate what he had said in Robb's presence and that she felt his language and behavior were uncalled for. Shortly thereafter, Denton informed Barbara Murray about the paycheck episode, stating that if Malloy were under her supervision she would fire him. Murray, in turn, reported the incident to Operations Manager Seville who earlier that day had discussed Malloy's situation with Petrov and had approved Petrov's recommendation that no further action be taken against Malloy at that time and that his probationary period be extended. As appears from Murray's testimony, Seville, who had the authority to fire Malloy, simply expressed surprise that Malloy had given vent to an outburst of that kind. Apparently, he did not then consider the incident serious enough to warrant overturning his earlier approval of Petrov's recommendation.

Respondent introduced into evidence a memorandum from Denton to Long calling the latter's attention to the paycheck incident. The memorandum is dated February 1, 1980. Long testified, however, that he did not actually see this memorandum or learn of the paycheck incident until the afternoon of the following Monday, shortly after the "brown bag" lunch. By way of explanation, he testified that he was busy and behind closed doors all Friday afternoon and might not have been in his office during most of Monday morning. Denton, although still in the employ of Respondent at the time of the hearing, was not called as a witness by Respondent to corroborate Long's testimony in this respect. There is no specific evidence in the record, however, to impeach Long's testimony about when he learned of the paycheck incident. I accept his testimony that he was not made aware of the paycheck incident until after the "brown bag" lunch.

3. The "brown bag" lunch

On Monday, February 4, 1980, Malloy, along with approximately 25 other employees, attended a "brown bag" lunch called by management at which Long spoke to the employees about Respondent's nationwide operations. Long completed his address in about half an hour and then invited questions from the assembled employees about anything they wanted to talk about. About 10 minutes into the question period, Malloy asked, "What would the management attitude be toward the formation of an employee union?" Long was visibly upset by the question. He responded in substance that he saw no need for a union at TERA as the Company had always had an open door policy. Long indicated that he was curious about why the employees would want a union. Malloy pointed out that when annual salary reviews came up the employees would be in a position to bargain for increases. Another employee, John Milligan, then raised a question concerning the Company's policies about compensatory time, and mentioned that this was another area where "union type" bargaining by the employees might be desirable. Malloy also commented further about the desirability and advantages to employees of collective bargaining by describing how it operated at the Bricklayers' Union where a friend of his worked.[4] [2] Petrov testified that this was the first conversation he had with Seville that morning. He further testified that no actual decision had earlier been reached to fire Malloy. His testimony in these respects varied from that of Murray who testified that at a meeting that morning, which she, Seville, and Petrov attended, a decision was actually reached to fire Malloy that day, that Petrov had been directed to implement that decision; but that Petrov later that morning had "backed down" and decided to give Malloy a further chance. On cross-examination Murray agreed, however, that the "decision" asserted by her to have been made on Friday morning was canceled out later that morning with the approval of Seville who had the final say. Seville was not called by Respondent as a witness. To the extent that Murray's testimony differs from that of Petrov, I credit the latter who impressed me by his overall testimony as a more reliable witness. For like reasons, I do not credit Long's testimony that on Friday, February 1, he was informed by Seville that a decision, to be implemented by Petrov, had been made to fire Malloy that day, and that he had approved that decision.

[3] The quoted language is from Robb's testimony which I accept in that regard. Malloy's recollection of the words he used is somewhat different, but not significantly so. His version: "Jesus Christ. Those dumb fuckers in California. I told Dee to put the right address on this."

[4] This finding is based on a synthesis of the testimony I find credible given by Malloy, as a witness for the General Counsel, and by Long, Linda Hillegas, and Olivia Nevins, as witnesses for Respondent. I do not credit that portion of Long's testimony which states that he responded, in part, that he would be happy to have the employees form a union if they wanted to. Long's testimony to that effect is not supported by the testimony of any of the other witnesses.

4. Subsequent events

To support his claim that there was a causal relationship between Malloy's question and comments at the lunch meeting and his discharge the following day, the General Counsel called Valda Wisdom as a witness. Wisdom, at the time material herein, was employed by Respondent as a supervisor but was no longer with Respondent when the hearing was held, having several months earlier voluntarily and on good terms quit Respondent's employ to take a better job. Wisdom's desk at Respondent's office was located about 5 to 10 feet from Delores Denton's. Wisdom testified that when she returned to her desk after the conclusion of the "brown bag" lunch, she found Long, Seville, and Denton at Denton's desk engaged in a conversation about what had occurred at the meeting. That conversation, she testified, lasted about 10 minutes. This is her account of what she heard said:

> Mr. Long was upset about what was asked about the unionizing at TERA and he said who the hell does he think he is, asking to form a union at TERA. Then I heard Mike Seville say that, let them go ahead and have their union. They are too small to unionize anyway. At that point I heard Jim Long say, give me his file, his personnel file, give me Dan Malloy's personnel file. I have had it. I have had it. And Delores Denton said, fire him, fire him, fire him.

Wisdom's aforesaid testimony stands on this record uncontradicted. Seville and Denton were not called by Respondent as witnesses, although at the time of the hearing they were still in Respondent's employ and not shown to have been unavailable. In his testimony Long did not specifically advert to Wisdom's testimony or deny making the statements she attributed to him.[5] Long did testify, however, that he had a conversation with Seville and Denton after the "brown bag" lunch meeting in which he expressed his resentment of the "hostility" Malloy had shown at that meeting. It was during the course of that conversation, according to Long, that Denton asked him whether he had seen her memo or heard about the Friday paycheck incident, and, when he said he had not, had apprised him for the first time of that incident. Although Long fixed the time of his conversation with Denton and Seville as "sometime in the first hour or maybe a little bit longer" after the conclusion of the lunch meeting, I am satisfied that it was the same conversation as the one to which Wisdom made reference.[6]

Wisdom was a disinterested witness and her testimony did not impress me as contrived. Other testimony given by Long also serves to lend credence to Wisdom's testimony that Long made the statement she attributed to him, reflecting his animosity toward Malloy for having raised the subject of a union at the lunch meeting. Thus, Long conceded that he was "upset" by Malloy's question and comments at the meeting. And at various points in his testimony he stated that he regarded Malloy's conduct at the meeting as "disruptive," as "very aggressive," and as having demonstrated a "poor attitude" and "hostility" on Malloy's part toward Respondent.

For the reasons indicated above, I credit Wisdom's aforesaid account of what she heard Long say. In doing so, however, I bear in mind that Wisdom's account is on its face an abbreviated and condensed summary of a 10-minute conversation and may not detail everything that was said. My finding, therefore, is not to be read as rejecting Long's testimony that in the course of the conversation Denton directed his attention for the first time to the paycheck incident, and it may well be that this was done before Long said, "I have had it."

The decision to discharge Malloy, although not effected until the following day, was made by Long on the afternoon of February 4. On that afternoon, Long, according to his testimony, told Seville that he had been informed of the paycheck incident; that he intended to discharge Malloy; and that he wanted the "final recommendations" from Malloy's supervisors that had been due Friday by the following morning.

On Tuesday morning, February 5, Long summoned Murray to his office. Long told Murray that he had decided to discharge Malloy and that he needed a memorandum from her. He asked her to write out everything she knew about Malloy. Later that day Murray prepared and submitted to Long a memorandum detailing the problems which she asserted supervisors had had with Malloy, covering the full 15-month tenure of his employment, including the period prior to May 1979 when, the record shows, Murray first became his supervisor. In her memo, Murray stated that Malloy's work performance had been inconsistent and "generally unacceptable" in quality; that he had a "sloppy handwriting," that on occasions he had abused comp time and other privileges; and that he had engaged in excessive socializing that had a disruptive impact on the work of other employees. Murray's memo then went on to point out that Petrov, after seeing some "slight improvement" in Malloy's work had, on the preceding Friday, given Malloy "his very last chance to improve his attitude and unacceptable work habits," but that Malloy later that day had engaged in the paycheck incident. Murray wound up her memo by stating that in her belief, Malloy during his 15 months' employment had been given every opportunity to improve, but had failed. Although Murray's memorandum was requested by Long and written by her on February 5, it was predated February 4. The reason for this was not explained. The memo, as dated, would have made it appear that it was requested by Long and written prior to Malloy's question and comments at the "brown bag" lunch.

[5] Respondent did through other witnesses attempt to refute Wisdom's testimony, but I find the testimony given by these witnesses to be of insufficient probative force to undermine Wisdom's credibility. Linda Hillegas, whose desk was adjacent to Wisdom's, testified that after the "brown bag" lunch she returned to her desk with Wisdom, but did not at that point "hear" any conversation taking place at Denton's desk. Linda Robb, whose desk was also close to Wisdom's, testified that she could not "recall" hearing Long engage in any discussion at Denton's desk on February 4, 1980. Little weight can be attached to the testimony of these witnesses. They may have been on the phone or absorbed in other work at the time, or they may not have paid attention to what was going on at Denton's desk for other reasons. Or if they did hear it, the subject may have been of insufficient interest to them to retain a recollection of it over the 8-month period that elapsed between the date of that occurrence and the date of hearing.

[6] Considering the nature of the conversation, even as related by Long, I believe it more likely that it took place very shortly after the lunch meeting, as testified by Wisdom, rather than at the time stated by Long. My belief in that regard is buttressed by the following quotation from Respondent's opening statement:

> Mr. Long came out of the meeting and he said what's happened on the probationary aspect of Mr. Malloy? He really had a bad attitude at the meeting. Whereupon one of the supervisors said, did you hear what happened Friday. He's got to go.

Petrov, who had been absent on Monday, was also summoned to Long's office on Tuesday morning, February 5, and asked by Long to submit his recommendation. Malloy was aware that Petrov had been called to Long's office that morning and had spent considerable time with him. As Petrov was leaving for lunch that day, Malloy followed him to the elevator bank and, as appears from Malloy's undisputed and credited testimony, had the following conversation with him:

> I said to him, I imagine by now that you have heard what I said at the meeting yesterday. He said, yes, I have. That was most unfortunate, and I said, well what is going to happen. He said, they have decided to lower the boom. I said, but surely they can't for just expressing my right of free speech. He said, well there's a lot of reasons. It's that, it's poor work, there was an incident where you cursed, you abused compensatory time. I tried to make brief objection to these things, but as I say, the elevator came.

Later that day, Petrov submitted his memorandum to Long. In it Petrov stated that Malloy had received two warnings from him, one several weeks before about the quality of his work, and the other the preceding Friday about excessive socializing. He pointed out that since the time of his first warning Malloy's work had improved to the point of being acceptable, and that Malloy had responded favorably to his second warning by promising "that he would maintain a more professional demeanor in the future." Petrov concluded his memorandum with the following statement:

> Since his current work does meet my standards of accuracy and—in the past few days anyhow—he has not been a disruptive influence, I would suggest that he has a point in maintaining that dismissal at this time is not justified.

At Respondent's facility, the recommendation of an employee's immediate supervisor is ordinarily given substantial weight in determining whether an employee should be discharged. Petrov's recommendation, however, did not alter the determination which Long had earlier reached to discharge Malloy.[7]

5. The discharge

At the close of business on Tuesday, February 5, Malloy was summoned to Long's office. Seville was also there at the time. Long informed Malloy that he was being discharged for poor performance; a bad attitude; and "disruptive" conduct. The specifications given him were essentially those which Murray had supplied Long in her memorandum that day. The payroll incident was among the reasons cited by Long as having contributed to his discharge decision. Even though Malloy denied this to be so, Long repeatedly stressed that Malloy appear to have a "hostile" attitude toward Respondent. When Malloy remarked that he felt he was really being fired because of what he had said about a union at the "brown bag" lunch, Seville, as appears from Malloy's credited testimony, brushed his remark aside with the comment, "Oh, we know this was just a joke."[8] Malloy's discharge was made effective immediately although he was told he would be paid to the end of the week.

6. Long's testimony relating to his reasons for the discharge

Before turning to an analysis of the facts of this case, the following items of testimony given by Long, and not previously reported, should be noted.

Long testified that his determination to discharge Malloy was based exclusively on Malloy's past inconsistent performance and "poor attitude" as an employee, coupled with the paycheck incident. Malloy's question and comments at the "brown bag" lunch, Long further testified, had no impact at all on his discharge decision, which, he added, would have been the same even if there had been no "brown bag" lunch meeting.

Long also testified in the end, although he had given variable and inconsistent testimony on this point as a 611(c) witness, that had the paycheck incident not occurred, he would not have disturbed the recommendation made by Petrov and approved by Seville on Friday, February 1, to extend Malloy's probationary period, and that Malloy would have remained in Respondent's employ until the next time he stepped out of line or his productivity again went down.

Long further testified that when he learned of Malloy's cursing episode he decided that that was "the last bit of disruptive conduct" he was going to tolerate from Malloy. Long made no claim that Malloy had ever cursed or engaged in similar conduct before. But, he explained, he considered Malloy's outburst "disruptive" because it had occurred "in the presence of a young lady" and in the operations area. Long had had no prior occasion to deal with that type of conduct because it had never occurred before. Had it been "a first time incident of a good employee," testified Long, he would have simply warned the employee not to do it again, but in the case of Malloy he regarded it as "the last straw" because of Malloy's past inconsistent performance and other problems Respondent had had with him during the 15-month tenure of his employment.

[7] Long testified that he was surprised by Petrov's memo because when he met with him earlier that day Petrov had agreed that Malloy should be discharged.

[8] Long's testimony that it was Malloy, not Seville, who said he was joking at the "brown bag" lunch is not credited.

The validity and weight to be given to Long's testimony in the foregoing respects will be dealt with in the next section of this Decision.

C. Analysis and Concluding Findings

The initial question in this case is whether Malloy engaged in activity protected by the Act at the "brown bag" luncheon by his questioning of Long as to how management would react to the formation of a union and his subsequent comments about the desirability and advantages to employees of collective bargaining. Malloy's question and comments, which were obviously intended for the ears, not only of Long, but of the assembled employees, not only indicated that he supported the idea of forming a union for the purpose of collective bargaining with Respondent, but in effect proposed to the employees that they give consideration to that idea as a means of furthering their mutual interests. There can be little doubt that Malloy's question and comments constituted protected activity within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act, which, inter alia, gives employees the right "to self-organization, to form . . . labor organizations . . . and to engage in other activities for the purpose of collective bargaining and other mutual aid and protection." The right to "self-organization" and to "form" labor organizations quite clearly encompasses the right to propose or suggest such self-organization or formation. And, as stated in Owen-Corning Fiberglass Corporation v. N.L.R.B., 407 F.2d 1357, 1365 (4th Cir. 1969):

> The activity of a single employee in enlisting the support of his fellow employees for their mutual aid and protection is as much "concerted activity" as is ordinary group activity. The one seldom exists without the other.

I find accordingly.

That brings me to the issue of whether there was a causal relationship between Malloy's protected activity, as found above, and his discharge the following day. The respective positions of the parties have been fully set forth in the introductory subsection of this Decision and need not now be repeated. I shall consider this issue in the light of the Board's causation test as set out in Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

There can be little doubt from the record in this case that the General Counsel has made out a prima facie showing sufficient to support an inference that Malloy's protected activity at the "brown bag" lunch was a motivating factor in Respondent's decision to discharge him. Such an inference may fairly be drawn from the factual findings made above showing: (1) the close timing of the discharge in relationship to Malloy's protected activity; (2) Long's admission at the hearing that he was "upset" by Malloy's question and comments at the "brown bag" lunch and that he regarded Malloy's conduct at the meeting as "aggressive" and as having manifested a "poor attitude" and "hostility" toward Respondent; (3) Long's evident animus toward Malloy for having raised the question of a union at the meeting, as reflected by his irate declaration to Denton and Seville shortly after the meeting, "Who the hell does he think he is, asking to start a union at TERA"; and (4) Petrov's remark to Malloy at about noon on February 5, that it was "most unfortunate" that Malloy had said what he had at the "brown bag" lunch, together with his ensuing statement, in explanation of his remark, that Long had decided to "lower the boom" on Malloy for that among other reasons, including the paycheck incident.

The question remains, however, whether Respondent has sustained the evidentiary burden placed on it under the Wright Line causation test of demonstrating that it would have discharged Malloy even in the absence of Malloy's protected activity. Although I confess that this aspect of the case has been a troublesome one for me, I have after long and careful consideration come to the conclusion that an affirmative answer to the question posed above is justified by the evidence in this case—and this for the reasons to be stated below.

The record shows that at the time of his discharge, and for a substantial period preceding it, Malloy had been regarded by Respondent as a marginal employee. As shown by the findings made above, throughout the period of his employment Malloy had a record of inconsistent and often substandard performance. Respondent also had problems with Malloy's job behavior, such as his tendency to engage in excessive socializing that had a disruptive effect on the work of other employees. Several weeks before his discharge, Malloy had been warned about the poor quality of his work and had been placed on probation for a 2- or 3-week period. During the last week of January 1980, serious consideration had been given by his supervisors to terminating him at the end of that week. However, on Friday morning, February 1, Petrov had observed an improvement in the quality of Malloy's most recent work and, with the approval of Seville, had extended his probationary period indefinitely. However, Petrov found it necessary that day to warn Malloy about his excessive socializing, which had grown out of hand, and had also cautioned him about the importance of maintaining a good job attitude. At that time, Malloy promised that he would "maintain a more professional demeanor in the future."

Malloy's paycheck outburst occurred about 2 hours or so after his conversation with Petrov that same Friday. The hostile and obscene language Malloy used in the presence of Robb in expressing his irritation with Denton and her staff over the error on his W-2 form cannot in this case be lightly brushed aside as a trivial matter. Malloy's own testimony shows that Denton, the administrative manager at the facility, was infuriated by the profane and hateful language he had used in the presence of Robb, and regarded it as serious misconduct on his part. Denton, not only complained about Malloy's conduct to Murray, to whom she expressed her opinion that Malloy should be fired for it, but also prepared a written complaint about the incident addressed to Long.

In light of the foregoing facts, I believe that Long, when made aware of the paycheck incident the following Monday, could honestly have viewed Malloy's profane and abusive outburst not only as giving Respondent proper cause for disciplinary action, but also as a "last straw" warranting discharge action, when considered in conjunction with Malloy's probationary status, failure to sustain an acceptable level of performance, and other problems Respondent had had with him as an employee.[9] In these circumstances, I am unable to regard Long's discharge decision as so devoid of legitimate business justification as to negate the plausibility of his testimony that he would have discharged Malloy upon learning of the paycheck incident even if there had been no "brown bag" lunch. Accordingly, I credit Long's testimony in that respect, and on the basis of his testimony and the evidentiary support for it in this record, I find that Respondent has successfully demonstrated that it would have discharged Malloy at the time it did and for the legitimate reasons it asserts it did even in the absence of his union activities.

It follows, as I read the Board's Wright Line causation test, that Malloy's discharge must be found to be nondiscriminatory even though, as the evidence in this record shows, Long was displeased with Malloy's questions and comments at the "brown bag" lunch found above to constitute protected activity and may for that reason also have welcomed Malloy's discharge. (See Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education, 429 U.S. 274, 285 (1977), and the quotation therefrom in Wright Line, supra at 1086.)

For the reasons stated above, I conclude and find that the General Counsel has failed to satisfy the ultimate burden imposed on him of establishing the complaint's unfair labor practices allegations by a preponderance of the evidence (Wright Line, supra, fn. 11). Accordingly, I shall recommend dismissal of the complaint.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent has not, as alleged in the complaint, engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

[Recommended Order for dismissal omitted from publication.]

[9] The record does show, to be sure, that on Friday when Murray reported to Seville Denton's complaint about Malloy's cursing conduct in the presence of a member of her staff, Seville merely expressed surprise and apparently did not then regard Malloy's behavior as a matter of serious enough consequence to reverse his earlier approval that day of Petrov's recommendation that no action be taken at that time against Malloy and that Malloy's probationary period be extended indefinitely. This is an item of evidence that has given me some pause in the conclusion I reach here, since it may be construed as an indication that Long would have similarly evaluated Malloy's cursing conduct were it not for Malloy's intervening protected activity. However, I do not think such an inference is reasonably warranted for two reasons: First, Long was Seville's superior and, therefore, not bound by his judgment. Second, Seville and Denton each headed separate staffs at Respondent's facility, Seville the operations staff, and Denton the administrative staff. As project manager, Long could be expected to have a greater sense of obligation to correct grievances emanating from the administrative staff, as well as to support the recommendation of the manager of that staff.

Labor Services, Inc. and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 99, AFL-CIO, CLC, Petitioner. Case 1-RC-17208

January 7, 1982

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

By Chairman Van de Water and Members Fanning, Jenkins, Zimmerman, and Hunter

The National Labor Relations Board has considered objections to an election held on April 22, 1981,[1] and the Regional Director's report recommending disposition of same. The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and hereby adopts the Regional Director's findings and recommendations.[2]

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

It is hereby certified that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 99, AFL-CIO, CLC, and that, pursuant to Section 9(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the said labor organization is the exclusive representative of all the employees in the following appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment:

> All journeymen, electricians and apprentices employed by the Employer from its Pawtucket, Rhode Island location and who work in the Employer's Pawtucket, Rhode Island area operations; but excluding all other employees including all office clerical employees, professional employees, truck drivers, stock clerks, part-time employees who work less than 20 hours a week, estimators, draftsmen, salesmen, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Chairman Van de Water and Member Zimmerman, dissenting:

Contrary to our colleagues and the Regional Director, and for the reasons set forth below, we would sustain the Employer's Objection 1. The election was conducted on April 22, 1981, at the Howard Johnson Motor Lodge in Pawtucket, Rhode Island, from 5 to 7 p.m. Of the 18 ballots cast in the election, 13 were for the Petitioner and 5 against. The Employer filed timely objections to conduct affecting the results of the election, alleging that the Petitioner bought drinks for employees at the Howard Johnson Motor Lodge both immediately before and during the time that the polls were open. The essential facts, contained in affidavits presented by the Employer, are as follows:

At or about 4:30 p.m. on the day of the election, five or six of the Employer's employees entered the cocktail lounge in the Howard Johnson Motor Lodge. The Petitioner's business manager, Richard Stromberg, who was already in the lounge, greeted the employees, and told them he would buy them drinks and would not allow the bartender to take their money. Stromberg then instructed the bartender to put the employees' drinks on his bill. Shortly before 5 p.m., the time the polls opened, two or three of the employees finished their drinks and started to leave the lounge. Stromberg told them there was no hurry, there were still a few minutes before they had to vote, and there was time for another drink. Stromberg reminded them that he was buying their drinks and that they should order what they wanted, and he reminded the bartender to put the drinks on his bill.

After a few more minutes, the employees started to leave and, as they did, Stromberg said to them, "Don't forget how to vote." A few minutes later the employees returned to the lounge and continued to order drinks which were put on Stromberg's bill. Additional employees entered the lounge, and they were also told that Stromberg was buying their drinks. Eventually, 12 to 15 of the Employer's 18 employees were in the lounge charging drinks to Stromberg.

Assuming the truth of these facts, we find that the Petitioner's conduct constituted objectionable election interference. The Board endeavors to conduct each election under conditions which maximize employees' freedom of choice. Towards this goal, the Board announced in Milchem, Inc.[3] a rule proscribing certain last-minute electioneering between voters and parties to the election. We recognize that the Petitioner's conduct here does not fall within the four corners of the Milchem rule. However, we view the Petitioner's conduct as providing "the potential of distraction, last-minute electioneering or pressure, and unfair advantage"[4] which the Board sought to curtail in Milchem. See the dissenting opinion of former Chairman Miller in Lach-Simkins Dental Laboratories, Inc., 186 NLRB 671, 672 (1970).

[1] The election was conducted on April 22, 1981, pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election. The tally was: 13 for, and 5 against, the Petitioner. There were no challenged ballots.

[2] We have considered our colleagues' dissenting opinion but are in full agreement with the Regional Director's findings and recommendations which are in accordance with pertinent Board precedent. Our dissenting colleagues' concerns have been considered, and rejected, in various of the decisions cited by the Regional Director in his report. Accordingly, as more fully described in the Regional Director's report, a portion of which we have attached to this Decision as an appendix, we agree that the Employer's objection should be overruled.

[4] Id. at 362.

No justifiable purpose was served by the Petitioner's conduct. Nor was this conduct devoid of campaign rhetoric, which might minimize its impact on employees. Rather, the Petitioner unabashedly and repeatedly purchased drinks for employees prior to, during, and after the election, even to the point of encouraging some employees to delay their arrival at the polls by having another drink, and then underscored the connection between its largess and the election by exhorting them to vote for the Petitioner. Such blatant last-minute campaigning immediately prior to and after opening of the polls in proximity to the polling area at the very least distracts voters and may possibly sway their votes. Further, such conduct undermines the integrity of Board elections and disrupts the atmosphere in which they should be conducted. Casting ballots between drinks diverts employees' attention from the significance of the issue being decided in the election. Even if the Petitioner's conduct was not a planned campaign tactic, the Petitioner took unfair advantage of a fortuitous circumstance, the effect of which impaired employees' free choice.

Under these circumstances, we would sustain the Employer's Objection 1 and remand this case to the Regional Director for purposes of conducting a hearing on the Employer's Objection 1.[5]

APPENDIX

Pursuant to Section 102.69 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, I have conducted an investigation of the Objections and make this report thereon.

The election was held on April 22 at the Howard Johnson Motor Lodge at 2 George Street in Pawtucket, Rhode Island between the hours of 5:00 p.m. and 7:00 p.m. The motor lodge also contains a lounge with a bar.

In support of its Objections the Employer presented the testimony of Eugene Champagne and Edward Randall, two members of the Pawtucket, Rhode Island police force, who testify that they observed the following while they were at the bar in the motor lodge on the day of the election. At about 4:15 p.m., Petitioner's Business Manager Richard Stromberg and two other men entered the bar together. Stromberg greeted the men and told them that their drinks would go on his tab, that he would not allow the bartender to take their money. Stromberg instructed the bartender that the men's drinks were on him. The five or six men stayed and drank, while Stromberg and the two men with whom he had entered left briefly and then returned. Shortly before 5:00 p.m., two or three of the group of five or six men finished their drinks and appeared to be leaving. At this time, Stromberg stated in a voice that could be heard throughout the bar that there was no hurry, that there were still a few minutes before they had to vote, and that there was time for another drink. Stromberg again reminded the men that all their drinks were to go on his tab. After a few more minutes, the five or six men left together, and as they did so, Stromberg said, "Don't forget how to vote." A few minutes later, the same men came back into the bar and continued to drink on Stromberg's tab. The original group of men was then gradually joined by other men entering the bar until, eventually, there were 12 to 15 men drinking in the bar on Stromberg's tab. Around 6:20 p.m., Employer's President Robert Blanchette and the Employer's attorney, Robert Corcoran, also entered the bar and spoke with Officers Champagne and Randall.

Business Manager Stromberg testifies that he and other representatives of the Petitioner entered the bar shortly after the pre-election conference ended around 4:50 p.m. and began drinking by themselves. Three of the Employer's employees arrived at the bar, greeted the union representatives, and sat at a table for a drink. One of the employees insisted he buy the union representatives a drink. Stromberg finally agreed on the condition that he, Stromberg, would buy the next round. At that point, Stromberg told the bartender to run a tab for him and to give any of the employees of the Employer a drink when they came in after voting. Stromberg asserts that after the tally of ballots, when employees, the Petitioner's representatives, and Blanchette were all in the bar, Blanchette bought all the employees drinks and talked with some of them.

There is no evidence that drinking, buying of drinks, or any statements about voting took place in the immediate area of the election, or that any employees were inebriated before or during the election. Nor is there any evidence that employees entered the bar other than totally of their own volition, or that they were given advance notice that coming to the bar would result in free drinks. No evidence was presented that a commitment to vote for the Petitioner was a prerequisite for employees' receiving free drinks. Finally, no evidence was presented that any coercive statements were made by any person, or that anything of any exceptional value was bestowed upon employees.

I find that, even assuming the accuracy of the version of the above-discussed incident given by the Employer's witnesses, Business Manager Stromberg's conduct did not constitute objectionable electioneering or otherwise inhibit employees in the exercise of their free choice in the election. I note in particular the absence of any evidence of advance inducement of the employees to come to the bar or to vote for the Petitioner in order to get a free drink, and the fact that the incident occurred outside the polling area. Further, the value of the drinks given to the employees was not, in my opinion, sufficient to interfere with the employees' free choice at the election. Therefore, I conclude that the Petitioner's allegedly objectionable conduct was permissible electioneering and does not warrant setting aside the election. Movsovitz & Son, Inc., 194 NLRB 444 (1971) and cases cited therein at fn. 3; Lach-Simkins Dental Laboratories, Inc., 186 NLRB 671 (1970); Jacqueline Cochran, Inc., 177 NLRB 837 (1969).

Although the Objections allege "other acts of the Union," no evidence of any other acts was presented.

Accordingly, I find no merit to the Employer's Objections and recommend that they be overruled in their entirety and that a certification of representative be issued.

[5] As the Petitioner denies certain essential facts as alleged by the Employer, there appear to be substantial and material factual issues which warrant a hearing.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On May 26, 1981, Administrative Law Judge John H. West issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, counsel for General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent filed an answering brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and recommendations of the Administrative Law Judge only to the extent consistent herewith.

The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by attempting to discourage its employees from engaging in a strike and other protected concerted activities by withholding payment of accrued vacation pay. In its post-hearing brief to the Administrative Law Judge, the General Counsel also alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by canceling certain of its employees' scheduled vacations without notice to the Union and without giving the Union an opportunity to bargain over the unilateral change in working conditions. The Administrative Law Judge dismissed the complaint and the General Counsel's additional allegation in their entirety because he found that Respondent's reasons for withholding vacation pay and rescheduling vacations were legitimate and substantial, and that Respondent's actions were not motivated by antiunion considerations. For the reasons set forth below, we find merit in the General Counsel's exceptions and reverse the Administrative Law Judge's Decision.

The collective-bargaining agreements in effect between Respondent and the Union[2] were to expire on June 6, 1980.[3] During a June 4 collective-bargaining session, the Union notified Respondent that a strike would be called at midnight on Friday, June 6, unless new agreements were ratified by that time. Agreement on new contracts was not reached before the expiration of the old contracts and, consequently, a strike commenced at midnight, June 6.[4] Prior to the expiration of the collective-bargaining agreements and following the Union's notice of its intent to strike, Respondent's labor relations manager, James L. Spurgeon, decided, without notifying the Union, to cancel all scheduled employee vacations and withhold payment of vacation benefits.[5] Following the settlement of the strike, all employees were formally notified by Respondent that all vacations previously scheduled for June, July, August, and September had been "voided" and were to be rescheduled before December 29. Accordingly, Respondent's employees took vacation time and received vacation pay under the terms of the new contract.[6] No employee received money in lieu of time off as a result of rescheduling his vacation.

The collective-bargaining agreements between Respondent and the Union provide, inter alia, that each employee who has at least 1 anniversary year[7] of continuous service and who has worked at least 150 days within the anniversary year in which vacation time is earned shall accrue vacation time and vacation pay in direct proportion to the number of anniversary years of service with the Company; that employees shall receive vacation pay at the beginning of their vacation period; and that "vacations may, as far as possible, be scheduled for the employees . . . with mutual agreement of the employees and the Company." The contracts also contain management-rights clauses which speak to Respondent's rights to designate production schedules and to direct the work force. The agreements do not provide for pay in lieu of actual vacation. Respondent stated that it is customary for employees to begin their vacations on Monday and that it

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] Respondent's business primarily consists of a can manufacturing plant and a food processing plant. The Union is the collective-bargaining representative of the hourly paid production, maintenance, and warehouse employees at each plant. Respondent and the Union are signatories to collective-bargaining agreements at each plant.

[3] All dates herein refer to the year 1980, unless otherwise specifically stated.

[4] The strike ended on August 23 following the ratification of new collective-bargaining agreements.

[5] The General Counsel characterizes Respondent's decision with respect to vacations as a withholding of vacation pay and unilateral cancellation and rescheduling of vacations, while Respondent and the Administrative Law Judge refer to the action merely as a rescheduling of vacations. Despite the differing perceptions of Respondent's actions, it is undisputed that, as a direct result of Respondent's decision, 82 of Respondent's employees did not receive scheduled vacation benefits which had accrued under the terms of the expired collective-bargaining agreements.

[6] As noted by the Administrative Law Judge, the vacation pay eventually received by the employees was greater than that which they would have received under the old contract because a higher wage package was included in the new contract.

[7] The contracts define "anniversary year" as the 12 months following the employee's anniversary date of last hire.

is an established practice for Respondent to pay vacation benefits on the Friday preceding the start of the vacation period.

In dismissing the complaint, the Administrative Law Judge found that Respondent did not unlawfully reschedule its employees' vacations, that it did so in accordance with past practice and the pertinent provisions of the contracts, and that Respondent, therefore, had legitimate business reasons for rescheduling the vacations. Further, the Administrative Law Judge found that the record contains no evidence of union animus or hostility.

Respondent contends that its decision to cancel scheduled vacations and withhold accrued vacation pay was based on business justification; i.e., its past practice and its belief that it had a contractual right to do so.[8] It asserts that, pursuant to those considerations, it reached that decision (1) because it was not contractually required to pay vacation pay in lieu of vacation; (2) because it did not know how many employees would cross the picket line and, if production continued during the strike, Respondent wanted to maximize the number of employees available to work; and (3) to provide periods of rest and relaxation away from work from which it would benefit in terms of increased efficiency, and, therefore, an employee must be working in order to take a vacation. The General Counsel argues that, but for the strike, the employees entitled would have received vacation pay in accordance with the contracts and past practice, and that, under N.L.R.B v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26 (1967), Respondent's failure to pay vacation benefits when due was discriminatory and inherently destructive of employees' rights and violative of the Act, even in the absence of independent evidence of unlawful motive. Alternatively, the General Counsel asserts that the employees had satisfied all contractual requirements necessary to accrue and receive vacation benefits, and Respondent's asserted business reasons for canceling benefits were pretextual and motivated by antiunion considerations.

None of the contractual provisions relied on, including the management-rights clauses, clearly or specifically authorizes the conduct in which Respondent engaged. Respondent claims, and the Administrative Law Judge found, that Respondent's past practice during potential and actual strike activity shows a consistent policy based on its interpretation of the effective collective-bargaining agreements. Our examination of the evidence, however, fails to support that conclusion.

The pertinent evidence shows that, during a strike in 1974, Respondent's employees were paid their accrued vacation pay although they were required to take vacations following the strike.[9] In the present case, all vacation benefits were canceled for the duration of the strike.[10] In 1977, in response to the Union's threat to strike, Respondent posted a notice stating that in the event of a strike no vacation benefits would be paid and all vacations would be rescheduled, but no strike occurred, and no vacation benefits were withheld or vacations canceled. Here, Respondent canceled vacations and withheld vacation pay from employees prior to the commencement of the strike and before it could be determined that a strike actually was going to take place. The 1974 and 1977 instances encompass Respondent's history of past practice in strike-related situations, and they clearly fail to establish the pattern claimed by Respondent.

Respondent further asserts as a business justification that an employee must be working in order to go on vacation and, because the employees were striking rather than working, it was permissible to cancel their vacations and withhold vacation benefits. This contention, however, is not supported by either its bargaining agreements or its past practice. As noted, the contract is silent in this regard. Moreover, on June 6, before it knew who, if anyone, would participate in the called strike, Respondent canceled vacations and withheld vacation pay from employees who, but for the strike, would have received their vacation benefits well before the start of the strike. In addition, the withholding of such benefits from nonworking employees has not, in fact, been Respondent's practice. The record shows instead that vacation benefits consistently have been provided on a regular basis to employees on leave of absence and sick leave immediately before the start of their scheduled vacations. Thus, Respondent's asserted belief that it had a contractual right to withhold the benefits cannot withstand scrutiny.

It is immaterial, therefore, that Respondent was not contractually required to pay vacation pay in lieu of vacation. Rather, Respondent was not empowered by either the collective-bargaining agreements or past practice to refuse to pay earned vacation benefits.

It is readily apparent that, under the contracts, the employees were entitled to vacation pay and that, pursuant to past practice, but for the strike activity, those entitled would have been able to take their vacations and receive vacation pay on request. Accordingly, we find no merit in Respondent's contention that employees cannot be on strike and on vacation at the same time. There is no evidence here that Respondent had a contractual right or other legitimate business justification for dictating how time off from work should be spent.[11] Its desire to maximize the number of employees available for work during the strike does not give it the right to penalize employees for choosing to exercise their Section 7 right to strike.

[8] As set forth in full by the Administrative Law Judge, we specifically note that the contractual management-rights clauses provided, inter alia, that the authority vested to the Company "will not be used for the purpose of discrimination against any member of the Union."

[9] It is not clear from the record whether the Union took part in formulating the 1974 arrangement with respect to vacation benefits, or whether Respondent unilaterally decided to pay accrued benefits and rescheduled vacations.

[10] A small number of vacation checks covering vacations scheduled to start on June 9 were erroneously distributed prior to the strike.

The Administrative Law Judge found that the evidence fails to establish antiunion motivation. We have found that the reasons advanced by Respondent are not supported by the record. Here, upon learning of the Union's intent to strike, and prior to the start of the strike, Gary Miller, Respondent's plant superintendent, told the Charging Party, Earl Martin, that it was the Union's fault that Martin did not receive the vacation pay to which he was entitled. By placing the onus on the Union for the withholding of vacation benefits, Respondent clearly demonstrated that its actions were taken in retaliation against the Union and to attempt to discourage its employees from engaging in protected concerted activity and striking. In addition, during the strike, Respondent's employee relations manager told an employee that he would not receive his vacation pay because Respondent decided that he could not vacation and strike at the same time.[12]

We find, therefore, contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, that the reasons asserted by Respondent in defense of its actions are pretextual or unlawful, and that Respondent's denial of earned vacations and vacation pay violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.[13] We further find that, by unilaterally changing the terms and conditions of employment respecting vacation pay and vacations, Respondent also violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.[14]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. United Steelworkers of America, Local No. 1473, is, and at all times material has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By withholding and deferring payment to its employees of their accrued vacation pay and canceling and rescheduling their earned vacations as specified in the controlling collective-bargaining agreements in effect between Respondent and the Union, Respondent unilaterally changed the wages, hours, working conditions, and terms and conditions of employment of its employees without advance notice and bargaining with the Union, and attempted to interfere with, restrain, or coerce and retaliate against its employees for exercising their rights to engage in union and concerted activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act, we shall order Respondent to cease and desist therefrom.

We shall also order Respondent to make the strikers whole for any monetary loss resulting from Respondent's unlawful action.[15] But for Respondent's unfair labor practices, employees whose vacations were scheduled during the strike would have received their vacation pay at that time and then would have worked continuously after the strike, receiving their weekly wages. However, because of Respondent's unlawful conduct these employees were required to take their vacation after the strike, thereby depriving them of work time and accompany wages. Thus, by failing to pay vacation benefits when payment was due, and by requiring employees to take time off following the strike when they would ordinarily have been working, the employees suffered a monetary loss equal to the amount they should have received at the time their vacation pay was denied them.[16]

As noted earlier, the alleged violation of Sec. 8(a)(5) was raised for the first time by counsel for the General Counsel in her post-hearing brief to the Administrative Law Judge. Upon a careful review of all the evidence, we are satisfied that the operative facts forming the basis for the violation are well established in the record. Credited testimony of Respondent's labor relations manager, Spurgeon, and employee relations manager, Paulsen, clearly shows that Respondent did not confer with or notify the Union about the cancellation of vacations and withholding of vacation pay. In light of this testimony and because the issue was fully litigated and is closely related to the subject matter of the complaint, we hereby find that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) by unilaterally canceling employee vacations and withholding and deferring payment of vacation benefits even though such conduct was not alleged to be an unfair labor practice in the complaint. In accordance with his partial dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth therein.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., Indianapolis, Indiana, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Discouraging membership in Local Union No. 1473, United Steelworkers of America, or any other labor organization, by discriminating against its employees by withholding and deferring payment of accrued vacation pay and canceling and rescheduling vacations because they engaged in or were about to engage in protected concerted activity.

(b) Unilaterally canceling scheduled vacations and requiring that all vacations be rescheduled, without notice to or consultation with the Union.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist the above-named or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from any and all such activities.

2. Take the following affirmative action which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Make whole, with interest, all striking employees for any loss of wages and/or vacation pay they may have suffered as a result of Respondent's failure to pay vacation benefits as provided in the effective collective-bargaining agreements. Backpay and interest thereon shall be computed in the manner prescribed in the remedy herein.

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Notify and bargain with the aforesaid Union as bargaining representative of its employees in the appropriate bargaining unit regarding any proposed changes in wages, hours, or working conditions of the said employees.

(d) Post at its Indianapolis, Indiana, facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[17] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 25, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director for Region 25, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

WE WILL NOT discriminate against employees in order to discourage membership in Local Union No. 1473, United Steelworkers of America, or any other labor organization, by withholding and deferring payment of accrued vacation pay and canceling and rescheduling vacations because they engaged in or were about to engage in protected concerted activity.

[16] See, generally, Westinghouse Electric Corporation, 237 NLRB 1209 (1978).

[17] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing and Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

We will not unilaterally cancel scheduled vacations and require that all vacations be rescheduled without first giving notice to and bargaining with the Union.

We will not in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist the above-named or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from any and all such activities.

We will make whole, with interest, all striking employees for any loss of wages and/or vacation pay they may have suffered as a result of our failure to pay their vacation benefits as provided in the effective collective-bargaining agreements.

We will notify and bargain with the Union regarding any proposed changes in wages, hours, or working conditions of our employees.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

John H. West, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard at Indianapolis, Indiana, on February 9, 1981, pursuant to a charge filed on June 12, 1980, and a complaint which was issued on July 18, 1980, as amended on January 30, 1981. The complaint alleges that the Respondent, Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (the Act), in that it withheld from its employee Earl Martin and other of its employees vacation pay in order to discourage employees from engaging in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection and engaging in a strike. A timely answer was filed by Respondent on July 29, 1980.[1]

Upon the record,[2] including the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I hereby make the following:

Findings of Fact

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, an Indiana corporation, maintains its principal office and place of business, a can manufacturing plant and a food processing plant, at Indianapolis. During the 12-month period ending June 30, 1980, Respondent (1) sold and shipped from its Indianapolis facilities products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside Indiana, and (2) purchased, transferred, and delivered to its facilities goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which were transported to said facilities directly from States other than Indiana.

Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Respondent admits, and I find, that the involved Union, United Steelworkers of America, Local No. 1473, is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The issue here is whether Respondent unlawfully rescheduled its employees' vacations because of their union activity.[3]

Respondent has had collective-bargaining relations with the Union at the involved plants since at least 1971.[4] As here pertinent, Respondent and the Union had 3-year collective-bargaining agreements for each of the above-described plants, which period ended June 6. The Union notified Respondent, at a negotiation session on June 4, that both plants' employees would be on strike as of midnight June 6. The strike lasted until new contracts were ratified on August 23 and the employees returned to work on August 25. At no time during the strike were any bargaining unit employees doing bargaining unit work for the Company.[5] Certain employees at the processing plant who were scheduled to begin their regular vacations on June 9 received their vacation checks on June 6. Other specified employees at both plants who had company-approved[6] scheduled vacations to begin on various dates from June 9 to August 25 did not receive vacation pay from Respondent during the strike.[7]

---

[1] All dates are in 1980 unless indicated otherwise.

[2] Respondent moves to correct p. 181 of the transcript, and, in support of its motion, it submits an affidavit of someone who was present in the hearing room and heard the testimony in question. The affiant's recollection is correct. The motion is granted and it, with the attached affidavit, is received in evidence as Resp. Exh. 13.

[3] The General Counsel, on brief, also contends that the instant case presents another issue; namely, did Respondent, as more fully described infra, unilaterally change the working conditions of its employees without giving notice to the Union and an opportunity to bargain over Respondent's conduct.

[4] The Union is the exclusive bargaining representative of the hourly paid production, maintenance, and warehouse employees at the plants.

[5] Supervisory personnel operated the can manufacturing plant during the strike. The plant manager, James Davis, witnessed pickets threatening truckdrivers and damage (hole in the cab and a shattered windshield) inflicted on a truck by a gunblast. He, himself, escorted trucks from the plant until they were outside Indianapolis. As found by the Superior Court of Marion County, Indiana, in Stokely-Van Camp, Inc. v. United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO, and Local Union No. 1473, et al., Cause No. 5780 0931, a temporary restraining order dated July 23, 1980, numerous acts of violence occurred during the strike and such violence intimidated and prevented employees who desired to continue to work for Respondent from entering Respondent's facilities. (Resp. Exh. 3. See also Resp. Exhs. 4 and 5.)

[6] Approval was given prior to June 4. Respondent's practice is to have employees fill out a vacation request form (i.e., G.C. Exh. 2). Company approval is either indicated on the form or by the Respondent's failure to deny the written request.

The pertinent portions of the agreements are set forth in the appendix hereto. [Omitted from publication.] Briefly, both required Respondent to pay vacation benefits to employees who complied with specified conditions.[8] The agreement which covered the can manufacturing plant contains the following provision:

> Vacations may, as far as possible, be scheduled by employees, upon sixty (60) day advance notice, according to seniority with mutual agreement of the employee and the Company. [Jt. Exh. 2, p. 15, par. 12.13.]

The similar provision in the processing plant agreement reads:

> Vacations may, as far as possible, be scheduled by the employees, according to seniority with the mutual agreement of the employee and the Company. [Jt. Exh. 1, p. 15, par. 12.13.][9]

Regarding past practices, it is noted that during the strike at these plants in 1974, which occurred subsequent to the termination of prior agreements which are said to be basically similar to the involved agreements, Respondent issued vacation checks and required employees to take time off after the strike ended; that in 1977 Respondent posted the following notice in its can manufacturing plant:

> ATTENTION ALL HOURLY EMPLOYEES
> Due to the Union's position that the company can no longer hire summer vacation replacements on a temporary employee basis after June 3, 1977, the company will no longer be able to extend to our employees the number of vacations during the summer months as we have in the past. The company regrets having to take this action, but under the circumstances we have no alternative. Any employee affected will be notified by their foreman of the necessity to re-schedule their vacation.[10]

It also posted the following notice in its can manufacturing plant:

> ATTENTION ALL EMPLOYEES
> In the event of a work stoppage at Plant #063, there will be no payment of vacation benefits. All employees scheduled to go on vacation while the work stoppage is in effect, must re-schedule their vacation at a later date.
> If there is no work stoppage, all employees scheduled to go on vacation on Monday, June 6, 1977 may pick up their vacation checks on Monday, June 6, 1977 after 9:00 AM.[11]

After it was notified by the Union on June 4 of the upcoming strike, Respondent decided to reschedule vacations so that they would be taken after the strike ended. The basis stated at the hearing by Respondent's labor relations manager, James Spurgeon, for his decision was that (1) he believed Respondent had the contractual right to reschedule vacations pursuant to provision 12.13 of both agreements,[12] as described above, and the management-rights clause, which speaks to the direction of the work force and Respondent's right to designate production schedules,[13] (2) he did not know whether all of the employees would honor the strike and, if production continued during the strike, Respondent wanted as many employees available as possible, and (3) he believed that vacations should be taken from work and if employees are on a strike they are not working. Respondent did not notify the Union of its decision prior to implementing it.[14]

About 3 weeks before the involved strike, Larry Martin, then an employee in the processing plant, asked Lester Paulsen, the employee relations manager at that facility, what would happen to his pay for his vacation which was to begin June 16 if there was a strike. Paulsen stated that Respondent would "probably mail it to you like before, but that's all I can tell you right now." Larry Martin understood "like before" to refer to the 1974 strike.

On Friday, June 6, Earl Martin, then an employee in the can manufacturing plant, received his paycheck at the beginning of the day shift. He did not, however, receive a check for his regular vacation which had been approved (G. C. Exh. 2) and which was supposed to begin on Monday, June 9. In the company of a union representative, Joe Eddington, Earl Martin spoke with the plant superintendent, Gary Miller. Earl Martin pointed out that he was supposed to go on vacation on Monday, and that he had earned the vacation and was entitled to it. Miller agreed. But he said that the employees could not be on a work stoppage and a vacation at the same time, and that it was the Union's fault because during the negotiations they had expressed the desire to go out on strike if the contract was not settled by midnight June 6. Eddington then stated, "Earl, they're not going to give you any more money than they have to to support the strike."[15] [7] Involved are approximately 17 processing plant employees and 65 can plant employees.

[8] Essentially, benefits accrued under both agreements to those unit members who had been employed for a full year or more and who worked a minimum of 150 days within the anniversary year in which the vacation was earned.

[9] Both agreements also state "[e]mployees entitled to vacation shall receive their vacation pay at the beginning of their vacation period," and "[v]acation pay is based on the straight time hourly day rate in effect on the date vacation is taken" (Jt. Exhs. 1 and 2, p. 15 in both agreements, at pars. 12.14 and 12.15, respectively). Normally employees receive their regular vacation check on the payday before their vacation begins.

[10] Resp. Exh. 11. The notice was dated May 26, 1977, and was signed by Howard E. Winters, plant manager.

[11] Resp. Exh. 2. This notice was also signed by Howard E. Winters. Reference is also made by Respondent to certain of its conduct at another of its Indiana facilities in 1978 and 1979 at which it had a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union involved herein. The agreement is said to have been substantially similar to those involved herein. Respondent rescheduled for after a strike employee vacations which had been scheduled during the strike. The agreement itself was never introduced herein.

[12] Specific instances of Respondent rescheduling previously approved individual vacations were cited by Respondent; i.e., Resp. Exhs. 7 and 12. These reschedulings were based on Respondent's production needs.

[13] Art. V—Management Rights, in both of the involved agreements (Jt. Exhs. 2 and 3), reads as follows:

> The management of the Plant and the direction of the working forces, including the right to hire, suspend or discharge for just cause, or transfer, enlarge or combine, divide, decrease, or rearrange departments, and the right to relieve employees from duty because of lack of work or other legitimate reasons, designate the type of product to be manufactured, where it will be manufactured, production schedules and methods, processes and means of manufacturing are vested exclusively in the Company, provided this will not be used for purpose of discrimiantion against any member of the Union or be contrary to any other provision of this agreement.

[14] In answering a union inquiry made after Respondent refused to give out regular vacation paychecks on June 6, Spurgeon advised the Union that employees were not going to lose their vacations but would have them rescheduled when the strike ended. Spurgeon told the union representative that he did not believe that Respondent could "schedule somebody for vacation, from time off work when they're not working." The union representative did not demand on behalf of the Union that Respondent give vacation pay to the strikers.

Another employee of the processing plant, Elmer Cox, scheduled a vacation to begin June 16. On Friday, June 13, he picked up his paycheck inside the gate at Respondent's facilities. He asked Paulsen at that time why he did not receive his vacation check. Paulsen responded that vacation checks had all been canceled because Respondent decided that employees could not be on a vacation and on a strike at the same time.

After the 1980 strike ended, employees took time off with pay. Their regular vacation scale was set by the new collective-bargaining agreement. No employee received money in lieu of time off as a result of the rescheduling of these vacations. In fact Respondent points out that in the administration of the involved collective-bargaining agreements employees are not permitted to take vacation pay in lieu of vacation. The following notice was posted in the can manufacturing plant:

> All employees with Vacations scheduled in JUNE, JULY, AUGUST or SEPTEMBER, 1980—have been voided. All employees who had a Vacation scheduled during this period, MUST reschedule that Vacation, NO LATER THAN September 5, 1980.
> Employees who began a new anniversary year during June, July, August and September, 1980 and with Vacation time to take from their previous year, must start their Vacation no later than December 29, 1980.
> Employees with Vacations to schedule from their previous anniversary year will be given priority in rescheduling their vacations, in-so-far as is possible.[16]

III. CONTENTIONS

The General Counsel, citing N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26 (1967), contends that Respondent's conduct is "inherently destructive" of employees' rights and, therefore, no independent proof of illegal motive is required and no proof of business justification is adequate to defend the violation. It is asserted by the General Counsel that, even if the conduct is not "inherently destructive," Respondent failed to prove a legitimate and substantial business justification since those given by Spurgeon are pretextual in that (1) allegedly, neither the agreements nor any past practice developed at either plant permits Respondent to reschedule, at its will, a group of employees' vacations, (2) the management-rights clause was inapplicable since no bargaining unit employees did unit work during the strike,[17] and (3) Respondent's alleged policy of requiring employees to be working at the time they begin their vacations has exceptions, as admitted by Spurgeon; i.e., employees have been on leave of absence or sick immediately before their vacations, and this does not itself explain why those can plant employees whose vacations were to commence on Monday, June 9, did not receive their vacation paychecks. Moreover, the General Counsel contends that even if these reasons were relied on in good faith, they were insufficient justification, and, even if that is not the case, the challenged conduct still violated the Act because credible evidence shows that Respondent possessed an illegal motive. Consequently, reasons based on contract and past practice are, according to General Counsel, irrelevant.

As indicated above, it is the General Counsel's position that by canceling the vacations of a group of employees without giving the Union notice and an opportunity to bargain over the change in working conditions Respondent unilaterally changed the working conditions of its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. The General Counsel argues that the violation should be found and remedied even though not specifically alleged in the complaint since assertedly this issue was fully litigated at the hearing and it is intimately related to the subject matter of the complaint.

Respondent argues that rescheduling of vacations is not "inherently destructive" of important employee rights because (1) rescheduling by Respondent is authorized by the contracts[18] and past practices and, therefore, did not represent any diminution of vacation benefits, and (2) rescheduling vis-a-vis a denial of vacation benefits can be unlawful only if an antiunion motivation for the action is established.[19] Assertedly, Respondent had a substantial legitimate business justification for rescheduling vacations. It took the same action during prior actual and threatened strike situations involving the Union, which Respondent contends demonstrates that it had the consistent policy based on its interpretation of the involved agreements. Production needs had resulted in rescheduling of individual vacations in the past. And, Respondent continued production at the can manufacturing plant using supervisory personnel and had work available for unit members throughout the strike. Finally, Respondent believes "that the strike made it inappropriate for employees to go on vacation since they were not working from which to take a vacation."[20] It is argued by Respondent that there is no evidence of any antiunion motivation. The statement made by Eddington, the union official, as to Respondent's motivation is assertedly not competent evidence of Respondent's actual motivation.

[15] The vacation checks which would have been given out on June 6 were in the can manufacturing plant but pursuant to Spurgeon's order to reschedule all vacations they were not given to the employees. As indicated above, apparently because of a misunderstanding those regular vacation checks which were in the processing plant on June 6 were given out (with the exceptions noted in the G.C. Exh. 3).

[16] G.C. Exh. 4. The notice was dated August 28, 1980, and signed by James G. Davis, plant manager.

[17] It is argued that this reason is pretextual; that if Respondent had been acting in good faith, without illegal motivation, then it would have issued the vacation checks when it became apparent that everyone was supporting the strike, or even at the end of the strike.

[18] Respondent points out that during the 1980 negotiations the Union proposed that the 60-day scheduling provision be amended to make the scheduling irrevocable inside the 60 days prior to the beginning of the employee's vacation. Assertedly, the Union, by attempting to obtain irrevocable scheduling of vacations, admitted that Respondent had the right under the preceding contract to reschedule vacations. Resp. Exh. 13.

[19] It is pointed out by Respondent that the vacation pay eventually received by the employees when their vacations were rescheduled was greater than they would have received at the time their vacations were originally scheduled.

While Respondent argues that there is no basis for finding that it committed an unfair labor practice, it points out that, even if this is not the case, an award of backpay would be improper because there is no evidence of any damage. Assertedly, any backpay award would constitute a windfall for the employees who fortuitously scheduled vacations during the strike.[21]

IV. DISCUSSIONS AND CONCLUSIONS

For the reasons set forth below, I do not believe that the involved conduct warrants a finding that Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

Under the former, it is an unfair labor practice for an employee "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in section 7 of the Act." Section 7 guarantees employees the right to "engage in . . . concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection . . . ." Under Section 8(a)(3), it is an unfair labor practice for an employer "by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization . . . ."[22] N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, supra, cited by the General Counsel is factually distinguishable because there, unlike here, the respondent refused to pay striking employees vacation benefits accrued under a terminated collective-bargaining agreement while it announced an intention to pay such benefits to striker replacements, returning strikers, and nonstrikers who had been at work on a certain date during the strike. As pointed out by the court in N.L.R.B. v. Borden, Inc., Borden Chemical Division, 600 F.2d 313, 320 (1st Cir. 1979), however, unequal treatment of different classes of employees is not a prerequisite to finding an 8(a)(3) violation where employees are discriminated against because they engaged in a concerted activity. But were the involved employees discriminated against because they engaged in a strike?

Involved herein is the scheduling of vacations. There is no provision in either of the pertinent agreements for money to be paid in lieu of actual vacation. And Respondent points out that in the administration of the involved agreements employees are not permitted to take vacation pay in lieu of vacations; to receive vacation pay employees must take time off from work for vacations.[23] The issue, therefore, is the scheduling of vacations and not merely the payment of accrued vacation pay. Texaco, Inc., 179 NLRB 989 (1969).

Respondent's practice under pertinent agreements with the Union was to reschedule vacations as necessary even after Respondent had given its approval. It appears that Respondent has not taken anything away from those employees who scheduled vacations to begin during the strike but merely required them to postpone their vacation. The Detroit Edison Company, 206 NLRB 898 (1973).[24]

In 1974 employees were given vacation pay during the strike but had to take time off after the strike. On the other hand, in 1980, employees, with the exceptions noted supra, did not receive vacation pay until they took their vacations, which is in accord with paragraph 12.14 of the involved agreements. When the employees did receive their vacation pay, it was set by the new collective-bargaining agreement and was greater than under the old agreement.

Respondent had legitimate business reasons on June 4 when it decided to reschedule vacations. The General Counsel's argument that the management-rights clause was inapplicable since no bargaining unit employees did unit work during the strike overlooks the fact that when the decision was made on June 4 to reschedule vacations Respondent could not have been aware of this. If subsequent events are to be taken into consideration, included must be the violent nature of the strike and its effect on (1) employees who may have wanted to continue to work, and (2) anyone in management who would contemplate reversing a legitimate determination. The exceptions to Respondent's policy that employees must be working in order to go on vacation prove, rather than disprove, the legitimacy of the rule. The policy is applied generally but exceptions are made when justified in individual circumstances.

[20] It is conceded that there are exceptions to this rule, i.e., employees on sick leave or leave of absence have been allowed to take their vacation at times when they would otherwise be working, but it is submitted that these exceptions were for the purpose of accommodating employees who were in difficult personal situations.

[21] By not paying vacation pay for vacations which were scheduled during the strike, Respondent contends, it caused all strikers to be treated equally in regard to payment of wages. As pointed out in Respondent's brief, perfect equality was not achieved in that the 19 employees who received vacation paychecks on June 6 and those employees whose vacation began before June 6 and continued into the strike were not required to take vacations without pay after the strike.

[23] As indicated in fn. 21, supra, there were some exceptions to this practice during the 1980 strike. These exceptions, however, appear to be an aberration and had nothing to do with whether these individuals did or did not participate in the strike.

[24] Compare this to the situation in Westinghouse Electric Corporation, 237 NLRB 1209 (1978), where the respondent therein denied vacation pay to strikers during a period when the plant was shut down but gave a week's vacation pay to nonstrikers. The strikers were given time off with pay at a later date but in effect were denied a week of work by the respondent because they refused to abandon the strike. This is not the situation at hand.

Antiunion motivation has not been demonstrated. The statements made by Paulsen and Miller do not suggest union animus or hostility. And Union Representative Eddington's statement was not adopted by Respondent.

The General Counsel's charge that Respondent unilaterally changed the working conditions of its employees in violation of the Act is not supported by the record. Respondent did not change the working conditions. As indicated above, Respondent's conduct was in accord with past practice.

I find that Respondent's reasons for rescheduling are legitimate and substantial and are not pretextual since no antiunion motivation has been demonstrated.

Upon the basis of the foregoing findings of fact, and upon the entire record in this proceeding, I make the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, and engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is, and at all times material has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. As found above, Respondent has not engaged in the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On June 12, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Irwin H. Socoloff issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, counsel for Respondents filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel filed an exception and a supporting statement and an answering brief to Respondents' exceptions, and the Charging Party filed a brief in support of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that Respondent Local No. 982, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO, Detroit, Michigan, and Respondent Carpenters District Council of Detroit, Wayne, Oakland, Macomb, Sanilac, St. Clair, Monroe Counties and Portions of Livingston County, AFL-CIO, Detroit, Michigan, their officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.

259 NLRB No. 129

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

IRWIN H. SOCOLOFF, Administrative Law Judge: Upon charges filed on February 6 and 9, 1981, by Chatham Supermarkets, Inc., against Detroit Building and Construction Trades Council, AFL-CIO, herein also called Building Trades Council; Local No. 982, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO, herein also called Local No. 982; Carpenters District Council of Detroit, Wayne, Oakland, Macomb, Sanilac, St. Clair, Monroe Counties and portions of Livingston County, AFL-CIO, herein also called Carpenters District Council; the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 7, issued an order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint, and notice of hearing, dated March 3, 1981, alleging violations by Respondents of Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii) (B) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, herein called the Act. Respondents, by their answers, denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

Pursuant to notice, a hearing was held before me in Detroit, Michigan, on March 30, 1981, at which all parties were represented by counsel and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce evidence. Thereafter, the parties filed briefs which have been duly considered.

Upon the entire record in this case,[1] and from my observations of the witnesses, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Chatham Supermarkets, Inc., herein also called Chatham, a Michigan Corporation, maintains some stores at various locations in the Michigan counties of Wayne, Oakland, and Macomb (Detroit area), where it is engaged in the retail sale and distribution of food and related products. During the year ending December 31, 1980, a representative period, it derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000 from the operation of those stores. In that same time period, it purchased and received, at its Michigan stores, goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which were sent directly from points located outside the State of Michigan. I find that Chatham Supermarkets, Inc., is a person and an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(1), (2), (6), and (7) and Section 8(b)(4) of the Act.

---

[1] At the hearing, I approved, over the objections of the Charging Party, an informal settlement agreement by and between the General Counsel and Respondent Building Trades Council. That agreement provides for a full and complete remedy for all violations alleged in the consolidated complaint against this Respondent. As it has not been shown that Respondent Building Trades Council has demonstrated a proclivity to engage in violations of Sec. 8(b)(4) of the Act, I find no merit in the Charging Party's contention that nothing less than a formal settlement agreement should be approved.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

Respondent Local No. 982 and Respondent Carpenters District Council are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

On January 19, 1981, Chatham began a construction project at Livonia, Michigan; namely, the conversion of a portion of an existing building into a "Warehouse Ways" store. It engaged Blitzit, Inc., herein also referred to as Blitzit, to perform the carpentry work at this jobsite. Chatham also entered into contract with Sokol Floor Covering, Oakland Service Company, and RFD Electric for performance, respectively, of floor work, plumbing, and electrical work.

In the instant case, the General Counsel contends, and Respondents deny, that, in furtherance of their dispute with Blitzit, whose employees are not represented by Local No. 982, Respondents engaged in certain unlawful secondary activities. Thus, the complaint alleges, and the answers deny, that, on or about January 21, 1981, Respondents, in violation of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act, threatened to picket at all of the Chatham stores unless Chatham ceased doing business with Blitzit. Also at issue is whether, from February 4 through 11, 1981, Respondents engaged in picketing at the Livonia jobsite, in violation of Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act.

B. Facts and Conclusions

1. The threat to picket[2]

John Sedor, Chatham's labor relations manager, testified that, on January 21, 1981, he received a message stating that Local 982 Business Agent Robert Schultz had called regarding the Livonia remodeling project. Sedor returned the call on January 22.[3] He was told by Schultz that the contractor at the Livonia jobsite was using nonunion help. Schultz further stated that the Union had had earlier problems with Blitzit and that Chatham "would have pickets at the stores." Sedor contended that Chatham did not have control over the contractor but Schultz replied that, nonetheless, Chatham could put pressure on the owner of the building to "get rid of Blitzit."

Schultz, in his testimony, admitted placing a call to Chatham in late January 1981, and leaving a message. He claimed, however, that he did not receive a return call from a Chatham representative. Based on demeanor impressions, I credit Sedor's testimony over that of Schultz and find that Sedor did, indeed, make a return call and have a conversation with Schultz substantially as he, Sedor, testified. I conclude that, during the course of that telephone conversation, Respondent Local No. 982, through its business agent, Schultz, violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act by threatening Chatham, a person and an employer with whom it had no dispute, that Respondent Local No. 982 would picket the Chatham stores unless Chatham ceased doing business with Blitzit.

2. The picketing

The parties stipulated that picketing occurred at the Livonia jobsite from February 4 until February 11, 1981. Some of the pickets carried signs readings: "Chatham Unfair. Carpenters District Council." Other signs read: "Blitzit Unfair. Carpenters District Council." In its answer, Respondent Local No. 982 admitted its responsibility for the picketing. At the hearing, it further conceded that its business agents, including Schultz, were present during the course of the picketing. Schultz testified that at least three officials of Respondent Carpenters District Council were also present while said picketing occurred. According to Schultz, the dispute concerned the fact that the Blitzit employees "are not represented by the Carpenters Union." The parties stipulated that Respondents did not have a dispute with an employer at the jobsite other than Blitzit.

In light of the Sedor-Schultz conversation, which occurred shortly before picketing began, and in view of the nature of the picket signs employed by Respondent Local No. 982, there can be little question that this Respondent picketed the jobsite, in furtherance of its dispute with Blitzit, with an object of forcing a neutral employer, Chatham, to cease doing business with Blitzit. Said picketing constituted unlawful restraint and coercion of Chatham and illegal inducement of the employees of neutral employers to refuse to perform services.[4] Respondent Local No. 982 thus violated Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act.

3. The responsibility of Respondent Carpenters District Council

I further conclude that Respondent Carpenters District Council is legally responsible for the secondary boycott activities as found, above. Under the constitution and laws of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America,[5] when there are two or more local unions located in one city, they must be represented in a district council which has the power to establish and maintain local work and trade rules for the local unions and their members, and to conduct trials of local union members charged with violating the constitution, the district council bylaws or trade laws, or the trade rules of a local union. The bylaws and working rules of Respondent Carpenters District Council, which includes Respondent Local No. 982, empower it to establish uniform dues and initiation fees to be assessed by all local unions within the district. Section 13(d) of the bylaws provides:

---

[2] In reaching the factfindings contained in this section, I have assigned no weight to the testimony of Chatham's construction manager, Alfred Walgenbach, regarding an alleged telephone conversation with the secretary-treasurer of the Carpenters District Council, Ralph Wood. That telephone call has not been properly authenticated.

[3] The telephone was answered by a secretary or receptionist of Local 982 who then transferred the call to Schultz.

[4] Respondents contend, in their brief, that the stipulated facts do not demonstrate that employees of neutral employers were actually present on the jobsite when picketing occurred. As picketing commenced shortly after construction work began, and continued for a period of 1 week, and as such picketing was, demonstrably, designed to enmesh Chatham in Local 982's effort to force Blitzit and its nonunion employees off the jobsite, I think it reasonable to infer, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the employees of neutral employers were at the site when picketing occurred.

[5] Respondents are affiliated subordinate bodies of that International union.

> The Secretary-Treasurer shall be authorized to furnish credentials to all Business Agents representing the United Brotherhood in this district and shall act as General Agent for the district, having under his direction all Business Agents of the district, whether employed by the Local Unions or this District Council.

Section 26 of the working rules provides:

> (A) Those members employed by the organization in the capacity of Business Representatives for a Local Union or District Council must at all times uphold and enforce the Working Rules and By-Laws of this district.
> (B) The Business Representative of a Local Union shall immediately report to the Secretary-Treasurer of the District Council his findings relative to the investigation and settlement of any dispute on a job.
> (C) Any Business Representative employed by a Local Union shall be responsible to the Secretary-Treasurer of the District Council, who as such, shall be considered the Prime Business Representative of the district.

These provisions establish that Schultz, as business agent of Respondent Local No. 982, was, in handling the Livonia jobsite dispute, acting under the direct supervision and control of Respondent Carpenters District Council.[6] Moreover, as noted, the pickets patrolling at the site carried signs bearing the legend of that Respondent. Said picketing was observed by officials of Respondent Carpenters District Council who visited the jobsite during the February 4 through 11 period. They took no actions of disavowal. In these circumstances, I find and conclude that Respondent Carpenters District Council is jointly responsible with Respondent Local No. 982 for violations of Section 8(b)(4) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECTS OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondents set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with the operations of Chatham Supermarkets, Inc., described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents have engaged in certain unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(b)(4) of the Act, I shall recommend that they be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Chatham Supermarkets, Inc., is a person and an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(1), (2), (6), and (7) and Section 8(b)(4) of the Act.

2. Respondent Local No. 982, and Respondent Carpenters District Council, are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By their threat to picket the Chatham Supermarkets, Inc., stores, unless Chatham ceased doing business with Blitzit, Inc., Respondents have engaged in unfair labor practice conduct within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act.

4. By their picketing activities at Chatham Supermarkets, Inc.'s Livonia, Michigan, construction site, as described hereinabove, Respondents have engaged in unfair labor practice conduct within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record in this case, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[7]

The Respondent Local No. 982, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO, Detroit, Michigan, and Respondent Carpenters District Council of Detroit, Wayne, Oakland, Macomb, Sanilac, St. Clair, Monroe Counties and portions of Livingston County, AFL-CIO, Detroit, Michigan, their officers, agents, and representatives, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

January 7, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

On June 16, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Hutton S. Brandon issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.[2]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Union Carbide Corporation-Nuclear Division, Oak Ridge, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(b):

"(b) Post at its two Oak Ridge, Tennessee, plant facilities (ORNL(X-10) and Y-12) copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being duly signed by a representative of Respondent, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material."

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HUTTON S. BRANDON, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me in Knoxville, Tennessee, on April 29, 1981. The charge was filed by Office and Professional Employees International Union, AFL-CIO, herein called the Union, on June 18, 1980,[1] and the complaint in the case issued on August 15, alleging that Union Carbide Corporation-Nuclear Division, herein called Respondent or the Company, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, herein called the Act, beginning around mid-May. More specifically, the complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(l) of the Act by removing, contrary to past practice, notices of union activities from its bulletin boards, by removing an employee petition involving union and protected concerted activities from an employee breakroom, by confiscating from employees notices of union meetings, by threatening employees with loss of personal and sick leave benefits if they designated the Union as their collective-bargaining agent, by soliciting employees to report to it the identity of employees who join or engage in activities on behalf of the Union, and by threatening employees with disciplinary action if they joined or engaged in activities on behalf of the Union. The complaint also alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by denying its employee Jean Kiel use of the Company's telephone, by reprimanding her, and by prohibiting, contrary to past practice, Kiel from talking about the Union with fellow employees during worktime.

Upon the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a New York corporation with an office, plant, and a place of business located at Oak Ridge, Tennessee, where it is engaged in operating certain laboratories and nuclear facilities. During the calendar year preceding issuance of the complaint, Respondent sold and shipped finished products valued in excess of $50,000 from its Oak Ridge facilities directly to customers located outside the State of Tennessee. The complaint alleges, Respondent by its answer thereto admits, and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[1] Although the Administrative Law Judge stated that Essex International, Inc., 211 NLRB 749 (1974), reflects current Board law, his statement is dictum and, moreover, he was unaware that Essex has been overruled by the subsequently issued decision in T.R.W. Bearing Division, a Division of T.R.W., Inc., 257 NLRB No. 47 (1981).

[2] Respondent has excepted to the Administrative Law Judge's recommendation that Respondent be required to post the notice to employees at each of its three Oak Ridge facilities (ORNL(X-10), ORGDP(K-25), and Y-12). Inasmuch as the conduct found unlawful herein occurred only at the X-10 and Y-12 facilities, and because there is no showing that the unfair labor practices found herein had an impact on the organizational activities at the K-25 facility, we find that the record is insufficient to require Respondent to post the notice at the K-25 facility, we shall limit the posting requirement to the two facilities where the unfair labor practices occurred. Read's, Inc., 228 NLRB 1402 (1977).

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Removal of the Union's Notices From Plant Bulletin Boards and the Confiscation of Union Material From Employees

Respondent operates three separate plant facilities in and around Oak Ridge utilizing some 17,817 employees represented by 20 various craft labor organizations in a coalition called the Atomic Trades and Labor Council (ATLC). Each plant facility which may consist of many different plant buildings and which may cover several square acres has a different function and/or product. Thus, the Oak Ridge National Laboratory (ORNL) is one plant facility engaged primarily in research and development and is referred to as the X-10 plant. The Oak Ridge Gaseous Diffusion Plant (ORGDP) is engaged in enriched uranium production and is referred to as the K-25 plant, while the third facility, known as the Y-12 plant, is engaged in weapons production. The plant facilities may be separated from each other by several miles and one of the plants is located in an adjoining county.

Respondent maintains bulletin boards in various of its buildings throughout all three of its plant facilities. The collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the ATLC, effective June 1978 through June 1981, and covering the Y-12 plant contains a provision on bulletin boards at article 15, section 1. That provision reads as follows:

> The Company shall provide the Union with suitable bulletin boards for the purpose of posting notices of union meetings and union social events. Any other material must be approved by the Company prior to posting.

An identical provision is contained in article 16, section 1, of the collective-bargaining agreement between the ATLC and Respondent applicable to the X-10 plant.

The Charging Party Union herein began its organizational campaign among Respondent's office employees at all three of Respondent's plants in mid-March. In connection with that campaign the Union prepared printed announcements of an open house held each Wednesday at a given location and time and invited employees of Respondent to attend. Employees were further invited in the announcement to call a specific telephone number for further information. These printed announcements were distributed to a number of Respondent's employees by the Union. One such employee, James Gilbert Diden, employed by Respondent in the Y-12 plant, testified that he distributed some of the Union's announcements to employees and about mid-June began posting the announcement on the bulletin board just outside the machine shop office[2] at building 9204-2 at the Y-12 plant. Diden testified that he was aware of no restrictions on the use of the bulletin board and had frequently seen the bulletin board used by individual employees to announce private items for sale, such as trucks, cars, motorcycles, and CB radios.

Diden testified that he experienced some difficulty in keeping the union announcement posted and over a period of about 1 week found it necessary to replace removed notices about 12 times. Diden was ultimately advised by other employees that supervisors, including Paul R. Wilson, the fabrication division general foreman and an admitted supervisor, were removing the announcements. Diden testified without contradiction that on or about June 20 he approached Wilson and asked him why the signs were being taken down. Wilson replied, according to Diden, "You are not recognized." Subsequently, on the same day, Diden observed Wilson remove one of Diden's announcements from the bulletin board, an announcement that Diden had posted only a short time before. Diden related that he had never seen anyone in supervision remove notices from the bulletin board before. He also added that the notices posted for personal items had remained on the bulletin board for from 2 to 4 weeks. According to Diden, the practice was that the employee who posted the notice on the bulletin board removed his own notice.

Wilson was not called as a witness by Respondent and Diden's testimony was thus not contradicted. On the other hand, his testimony received support from that of employee Jerry Peddicord who testified that he was aware of no restrictions on the use of the bulletin boards in the Y-12 facility where he worked. He related that he saw Wilson remove six different union notices from the bulletin board used by Diden. Moreover, Peddicord testified that he personally used the bulletin board in the Y-12 facility to announce personal items for sale. He received no prior approval from anyone and personally removed the notices on the sale of the items referred to in the posted material. One of his notices on a personal item remained posted for 3 months.

Peddicord further testified that he posted several of the Union's announcements on different bulletin boards in Y-12 facility buildings including the one in a facility cafeteria specifically identified as a "union" bulletin board. This also included bulletin boards in the areas of Y-12 where the production employees were represented by the Chemical Workers International Union, another member of the ATLC. While Peddicord related that he knew of no complaints by any union to his postings he observed salaried personnel, not identified as supervisors, remove them.

On June 26, according to Peddicord, Peddicord took a packet of about 25 of the Union's meeting notices into the plant and placed them in his desk drawer. After lunch that day he found that his notices were missing.[3] Subsequently, he had occasion to go to the desk of Wilson to get a tool and, in going through the drawers of the desk, observed the Union's notices he had brought in that morning, identifying them by the manner in which he had folded them for carrying in his shift pocket. He did not confront Wilson about the matter and was told only about a week prior to the hearing herein by Wilson that Wilson did not take the announcements from Peddicord. Nevertheless, Peddicord's testimony on the matter was credible and uncontradicted. Moreover, while Wilson may belatedly have denied taking the union's meeting notices he did not deny that he had had them in his possession, and obviously he did not return them to Peddicord. Accordingly, in the absence of any denial under oath at the hearing by Wilson, and because it is undenied that he removed similar notices when he saw them posted on bulletin boards, I believe it not unreasonable to infer that Wilson either took the announcements from Peddicord or they were taken with his knowledge and approval.

[2] It appears that the bulletin board was located in the work area of production and maintenance employees represented by Machinists Local Union 480, one of the craft unions in the ATLC. According to Diden, Machinists notices of meetings were posted on this bulletin board from time to time, apparently with no interference from management.

[3] Peddicord conceded that his desk was accessible to other employees looking for tools also retained in his desk drawers.

As the Board said in Container Corporation of America, 244 NLRB 318 (1979):

> It is well established that there is no statutory right of employees or a union to use an employer's bulletin board. However, it is also well established that when an employer permits, by formal rule or otherwise, employees and a union to post personal and official union notices on its bulletin boards, the employees' and union's right to use the bulletin board receives the protection of the Act to the extent that the employer may not remove notices, or discriminate against an employee who posts notices, which meet the employer's rule or standard but which the employer finds distasteful.

Here Respondent contractually granted to ATLC unions the right to post notices of union meetings and union social events. While the contracts made other postings subject to Respondent's prior approval it is clear from the credited testimony of Diden and Peddicord that, in practice, postings for personal items by individual employees, even unrepresented clerical employees, were not subjected to Respondent's prior approval. Indeed, there was no evidence of policing of the bulletin boards by Respondent except for the removal of the Union's meeting notices herein. It thus appears, and I conclude, that, in practice, Respondent did not have a restrictive policy with respect to employee use of the bulletin boards and had no previous policy of "policing" the bulletin boards.

Even where an employer has permitted the posting of personal notices by employees on its bulletin boards as well as official union notices regarding meetings, elections, and nominations, it may nevertheless legitimately bar use of the bulletin boards for rival partisan internal union campaigns which could be conducive to continual strife between rival factions and which could make the bulletin boards a battleground for competing groups. Nugent Service, Inc., 207 NLRB 158 (1973). Further, the Board held in Armco Steel Corporation, 148 NLRB 1179 (1964), that the contractual reservation of a bulletin board for the exclusive use of an incumbent union does not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act since such reservation constitutes a collective-bargaining concession which, when granted by an employer, may be accompanied by such usage regulations that the employer deems appropriate.

In the case sub judice, however, the posting of the notices of the Union's campaign meetings was not the posting of "rival" factions within the incumbent unions. Nor was it even posting of notices by a rival union. Indeed, there was no evidence that any of the incumbent unions objected to the meeting notices posted regarding the Union. Such notices could not be the basis for strife or discipline problems. Thus, since Respondent had allowed the indiscriminate use of its bulletin boards by employees for personal items without regard to any contractual reservations or prior approval, I conclude that it had waived such reservations. It follows that Respondent could not lawfully remove the Union's notices here.[4] Accordingly, I find and conclude that, in removing the posted material regarding the Union here, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

I further find that Wilson's confiscation of Peddicord's union notices also violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act inasmuch as it clearly interfered with his right to possess and distribute his material in nonwork areas on nonworktime. See Photo-Sonics, Inc., Instrumentation Marketing Corporation; Photo Digitizing Systems, Inc., 254 NLRB 567 (1981).

B. The Threatened Loss of Benefits

Diden briefly testified regarding a comment made to him by H. E. Hamilton, a dispatching supervisor, on June 25 in Diden's building at the Y-12 facility. According to Diden, Hamilton remarked that if the office employees did organize there was a possibility that they would lose their personal leave with pay and their sick leave with pay. Diden could not recall the context in which Hamilton's remark was made or any other circumstances surrounding the statement, but explained that what he did recall "just happened to register."

While Diden's testimony regarding Hamilton's statement is weak and suspect because of his failure to recall the context in which it was made, such testimony was not contradicted because Hamilton was not called to testify. Accordingly, and because Diden appeared to be a truthful and reliable witness, I credit Diden's testimony regarding Hamilton.

Hamilton's statement points to the "possibility" of a loss of certain benefits as a result of union organization. Without explanation or clarification the statement is clearly subject to the interpretation that the risk of the loss stems directly from the fact of organization rather than from the collective-bargaining process. It is the reasonable tendency of Hamilton's remark to coerce which is critical to the finding of a violation, not the existence of actual coercion of employees or unlawful motivation on Hamilton's part. El Rancho Market, 235 NLRB 468 (1978); American Freightways Co., Inc., 124 NLRB 146 (1959). Without explanation or clarification I find and conclude that Hamilton's remark to Diden did tend to coerce and restrain employees in their Section 7 rights and that Respondent by Hamilton's remark violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

C. The Taxpayers' Petition

Curtis Hammontree, an employee in the mechanical department of Respondent's X-10 plant and the chief steward of Millwright and Carpenters Local 2738 which represents certain of Respondent's employees in that plant, testified for the General Counsel that on June 16 he placed a petition given him by Bob Kiel, president of ATLC, in the lunchroom of building 2013 at the X-10 facility. The petition, captioned "Taxpayers' Petition," contained the following language:

> We, the undersigned, object to Union Carbide corporation's use of our tax dollars for anti-union activities. The United States Government is officially in favor of collective bargaining. We therefore call upon congress and the president to investigate and stop this improper use of our taxes.

Under the above language was space for signatures and, following that, the instructions to return the petition to the Union at a given address.

Hammontree testified that the petition remained in the lunchroom for 3 or 4 days. When he went back to pick up the petition he could not find it in the lunchroom. A supervisor named Earl Chapman reported to Hammontree that the petition had been picked up by John Fields, a general foreman and an admitted supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Hammontree, in the presence of another steward, Austin Massengill, and at the direction of Kiel, went to Fields' office to retrieve the petition. There Hammontree asked Fields for the petition but Fields related he had turned it in to the labor relations department. Hammontree asked Fields why he had picked it up and Fields replied that it was not acceptable to the Company. Hammontree's testimony on this matter is generally supported by Massengill who also testified. Therefore, and because he was not contradicted by any Respondent witness, Hammontree is credited.

It was also Hammontree's uncontradicted testimony that it was not unusual for employees to leave collection jars and sign-up sheets in the lunchroom for employees retiring or experiencing tragedy or other difficulty. The procedure was for employees to place money in the jar if they desired to contribute and then sign a sheet by the jar showing the amount contributed. These papers, according to Hammontree, were never disturbed by Respondent.

Respondent argues that it always had an unwritten policy against allowing political activity on its premises since its facilities were supported by Federal Government funds. In keeping with this policy, and because it viewed the "Taxpayers' Petition" as a political activity, it admittedly picked up Hammontree's petition.

The rights of employees under Section 7 of the Act are not without limitations and must be balanced with an employer's right to regulate his property. Republic Aviation Corporation v. N.L.R.B., 324 U.S. 793 (1945). And the Board has previously held that it is not unlawful for an employer to bar distribution on its premises of wholly political propaganda which does not relate to employees' problems and concerns qua employees. Ford Motor Company, 221 NLRB 663, 666 (1975), enfd. 546 F.2d 418 (3d Cir. 1976). But where the material distributed contains matters impacting on the employees' working conditions its distribution may not be lawfully barred because it also has political overtones or contains "social comment." See Samsonite Corporation, Inc., 206 NLRB 343 (1973). In the case sub judice the taxpayers' petition in my judgment does have direct impact on the employees' working conditions and, more specifically, their right to organize in order to change or effect such conditions. The petition, rather than seeking to persuade the selection of some political candidate or to influence the endorsement of a political party or platform, sought only to invoke the attention and aid of the President and Congress in enforcing a national policy on collective bargaining. The "problem" identified in the petition was the perception that Respondent, subsidized by Government funds, was utilizing such funds to thwart national policy by combating union organizational efforts. Thus, the petition, whether the premise on which it was based was ill founded or not, was directly related to employee working conditions as affected by their right to organize. It therefore constituted a distribution of material "pertinent to a matter which is encompassed by Section 7 of the Act." McDonnell Douglas Corporation, 210 NLRB 280 (1973).

I find and conclude that the taxpapers' petition was clearly a concerted and a union activity since it was produced by the Union and distributed through the ATLC. The distribution of union literature or material may not be lawfully barred in nonwork areas on nonworktime absent special circumstances not shown here. Republic Aviation, supra. Accordingly, I find that Respondent by confiscating the taxpayers' petition from a nonwork area violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged in the complaint.

D. The Solicitation To Report Union Employees

The complaint alleges that on May 21 Respondent, by distributing a document entitled "Freedom From Harassment—A Fact Sheet" to its employees, solicited its employees to report to Respondent the identity of employees who supported the Union. Bob Worrell, Respondent's labor relations manager for its Nuclear Division, admitted that around May 21 certain leaflets were distributed to employees in response to the Union's campaign. One of those leaflets bore the caption specified above in the complaint allegation and stated:

> The N.L.R.A. states that employees have the right to refrain from all or any labor union activities.
> The same law also makes it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights to refrain from labor union activities.
>
> Company rules are designed to protect employees while at work. This protection includes protection from harassment of employees while at work or on > the premises. Any such harassment should be reported to supervision.

> Thus any employee threatened, coerced or harassed because of exerting his/her right to refrain from labor union activities, including a refusal to sign a card, has dual protection by supervision and by the National Labor Relations Board if he/she desires to file a charge.

The General Counsel argues that the leaflet constitutes a solicitation to report legitimate union activity or solicitation. Respondent on the other hand argues that it does not, and that it only seeks to preclude that type of union activity which threatens, coerces, or harasses employees.

Recently the Board in Bil-Mar Foods of Ohio, Inc., 255 NLRB 1254 (1981), had occasion to reaffirm the principle that an employer's request that employees report instances in which employees were "put under pressure to join the union" was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The rationale for such a finding as stated in J. H. Block & Co., Inc., 247 NLRB 262 (1980), is that such requests to report have "the potential dual effect of encouraging employees to report to Respondent the identity of union card solicitors who in any way approach employees in a manner subjectively offensive to the solicited employees, and of correspondingly discouraging card solicitors in their protected organizational activities." Thus, consistent with this rationale the Board has found violations of the Act where an employer solicited employees to report union activity that caused them "trouble" or put them "under any pressure" (Sunnyland Packing Company, 227 NLRB 590, 594–595 (1976), enfd. 557 F.2d 1157 (5th Cir. 1977), and Colony Printing and Labeling, Inc., 249 NLRB 223 (1980); that amounted to "pestering or pressure" or being "bothered" (Lutheran Hospital of Milwaukee, Incorporated, 224 NLRB 176, 178 (1976)); that constituted a failure to leave employees alone (Poloron Products of Mississippi, Inc., 217 NLRB 704, 707 (1975); or that amounted to being "threatened in any way or subjected to constant badgering" (Bank of St. Louis, 191 NLRB 669, 673 (1971)). And in Bil-Mar, supra, the Board found an employer's request of employees to report union activity which "harassed, coerced, pressured, or threatened them" to constitute conduct warranting a rerun election.

The Board's rationale in the above-cited cases appears to be applicable to the language in the leaflets in the case sub judice. And the language of the leaflet here, particularly the reference to harassment, falls within the realm of language found unlawful by the Board when used as a basis for a solicitation to report union activity. Under these circumstances and on the precedent cited I conclude that the solicitation to report here has the proscribed "potential dual effect" described in J. H. Block, supra. Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged in the distribution of the May 21 leaflets.

E. The Reprimand of Jean Kiel

Jean Kiel was employed by Respondent as a secretary to George Marrow, the administrative assistant of the director for development, fifth division, at the Y-12 facility, and worked in building 9202. She had worked for a total of 8 years for Respondent but had a break in that employment and had begun her second period of employment about 2 years prior to the hearing. Kiel was described by William H. Dodson, director of development, as "one of the best" workers, and had been rated as "superior" during performance ratings in April. She had received a wage increase in May. Prior to May 29 she had never been warned or reprimanded regarding any aspect of her work.

On April 16 Kiel became involved in activity on behalf of the Union. In connection therewith Kiel posted notices regarding union meetings on bulletin boards at the Y-12 facility as well as on restroom and cafeteria walls, building walls, and facility buses. On May 27 Kiel was called into the office of Marrow, who advised Kiel that another employee had complained to Dodson that she was posting notices during working hours. He advised her that she was not supposed to do that. Kiel admitted that she had posted the notices but added that she had been careful not to do it during working hours. According to the testimony of Kiel, a very convincing and credible witness whose testimony was largely uncontradicted, Marrow appeared to be satisfied with her responses and the discussion of the matter ended.

On May 29 Kiel was again called into Marrow's office and confronted by both Marrow and his superior, Dodson. Dodson told Kiel that he had received two complaints about her union activities, the one that had already been discussed with Marrow on May 27 and the second involving a complaint from an employee at the X-10 plant that Kiel had spoken to her by telephone regarding union activities. Dodson told Kiel with respect to the first complaint that he was satisfied she had not posted notices during working time. With respect to the remaining complaint Dodson was either unwilling or unable to identify the complainant, but Kiel did not deny generally that she had telephoned an employee at the X-10 plant regarding union activity. Dodson admonished Kiel not to use the telephone for union activities because it took up her time as well as the other person's time. Kiel responded that she had not used the telephone for union calls any more than other secretaries in the division had used it for personal calls. According to Kiel, in the ensuing discussion Dodson told Kiel that she was not to use the telephone for personal calls at all explaining that he had to make it that strict because it was the only way he could have control over whether it was a personal call or a union call. Kiel complained that this was overly restrictive but Dodson cited the Company's phone book containing provisions prohibiting the use of company telephones for personal calls. Dodson went on to tell Kiel that she was not to talk with other employees about the Union except before or after work, during lunch hours, and when she and the other employees were on their own time. In addition, he told her that she could post union notices on the bulletin boards coming into the plant, but she should recognize that they would be removed. Further, Kiel was told by Dodson that she was not to use the interplant mail for any union communications. Finally, Dodson told Kiel that if she did not follow these guidelines she would be subject to disciplinary action.

On May 30 after confirming with Marrow her understanding of the limitations explained by Dodson and in keeping with those limitations Kiel rejected a personal telephone call from her daughter's high school. Because of this she apparently became visibly upset. This was reported to Dodson who came to Kiel and in the ensuing discussion explained to Kiel that she had misunderstood his earlier instructions and had overreacted. He said that Kiel could use the telephone for personal calls but not for union activities. He added that the telephone was for business use only, although it was Respondent's accepted policy for employees to use it for some personal calls. Kiel thereupon asked for written guidelines but Dodson denied her request.

According to Kiel employees had previously been allowed to use the telephone for local personal calls, and she knew of no one who had been reprimanded for this. Moreover, she said that secretaries such as herself had previously been allowed to engage in personal nonwork related discussions among themselves during worktime. Kiel admitted in her testimony that she had used her business telephone to talk to two employees at the X-10 plant as well as some employees at the Y-12 and K-25 plants regarding union matters. However, she estimated that such calls which had averaged about two per day were no greater in number or longer in duration than the local personal calls which she was accustomed to making. In addition, she testified that during the period when she made the telephone calls regarding the Union she stopped making her customary personal calls.

Based on Kiel's testimony,[5] the General Counsel contends, in effect, that Dodson's restrictions imposed on Kiel coupled with the threat of disciplinary action for breach of the restrictions constituted disparate and discriminatory treatment in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. In short, the General Counsel argues that the restrictions imposed on Kiel were "simply to discourage discussion about, and solicitation for, the Union on Company premises and to punish" Kiel by withdrawing unrestricted telephone usage as a condition of employment.

Respondent, on the other hand, argues that it has consistently restricted the personal use of its telephones. In keeping with this policy of restriction its telephone book states that personal calls were to be made only in an emergency and "must be placed collect, billed to personal credit cards, or billed to your residence telephone." Further, Respondent introduced a number of exhibits in evidence consisting of several back issues of its employee newspaper containing a question box column answering several questions on personal use of Respondent's telephones by employees.[6] Still further, Respondent points to a memo of Dodson in May 1979, to various supervisors in his division relative to abuses in telephone usage in which it is stated that the impression should be made on people that "the phones are business phones and should not be used except for business reasons or personal reasons of a type that we would allow personal leave."[7] Lastly, Respondent relies on a regulation set forth in its employee handbook, "You at Union Carbide" (Resp. Exh. 2) generally distributed to employees, which states that "Plant telephones are for the conducting of Company business only. You must refrain from making unnecessary calls." The handbook also contains the following no-solicitation rule which is cited in Respondent's brief:

> Unless authorized by the Plant Superintendent or Laboratory Director, you are forbidden to solicit, sell tickets, collect, transact any business, or indulge in any activity not related to your employment on Company time.

Respondent's brief refers to the foregoing rule as a valid no-solicitation rule. The General Counsel's brief refers to it as an unlawfully overly broad rule, although the rule was not alleged as a violation of the Act in the complaint.

It is clear from the credited evidence that Respondent, notwithstanding all its stated policies regarding the use of its telephones, had allowed Kiel and other clerical employees to use its telephones for personal reasons. Dodson acknowledged as much in his testimony. It is further clear that, on May 29 and 30, Kiel was chastized and threatened with discipline for any further use of her telephone for union-related matters. She was, however, allowed on May 30 and thereafter to use the telephone for personal reasons to the extent she had done so in the past except for union matters. Accordingly, Respondent did, I conclude, discriminatorily apply its telephone use restrictions against union activities. The issue is whether it was privileged in doing so.

It is well established that an employer may bar union activities including union solicitation on worktime. See, e.g., Essex International, Inc., 211 NLRB 749 (1974). But it may not bar union solicitation on worktime where it allows employees to engage in other forms of solicitation during worktime. See The Timken Company, 236 NLRB 757 (1978); Maremont Corporation, 229 NLRB 746 (1977); Walton Manufacturing Company, 126 NLRB 697 (1960). Where it enforces its work rules in a disparate manner against union activities an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In the absence of a formal and valid no-solicitation rule an employer may discipline an employee for solicitation but has the burden of showing that the solicitation resulted in actual work interference. See Midwest Stock Exchange, Incorporated; Midwest Clearing Corporation; Midwest Securities Trust Co.; Midwest Stock Exchange Service Corporation, 244 NLRB 1108 (1979).

In the instant case, I conclude that, as pointed out in the General Counsel's brief, Respondent's no-solicitation was overly broad and unlawful. See Stoughton Trailers, Inc., 234 NLRB 1203 (1978). This is because the phrase in the rule barring solicitation on "company time" has been held by the Board to be reasonably susceptible to the interpretation that an employee may not engage in solicitation while the employee is on the clock even at a time the employee has finished his work and is in a nonwork area. Florida Steel Corporation, 215 NLRB 97 (1974). Respondent's rule therefore serves as no defense to disparate application of restrictions without an affirmative showing by Respondent of actual work interference by Kiel.

[5] Kiel's credibility has already been noted. Dodson testified for Respondent but couched his testimony in more general terms. I credit Kiel wherever her testimony may be viewed as contradicting that of Dodson.

[6] Such answers related essentially to personal use of telephones for long-distance or toll calls or other extraordinary usage, and clearly indicated a company policy against this type of personal use.

[7] The reference to the use of personal leave apparently meant that the personal use of the telephone was acceptable if it were used to handle matters which would otherwise require the expenditure of personal leave, i.e., matters which would take the employee from his job.

Applying the foregoing principles to the instant case, Respondent could unquestionably bar its telephones to any personal use by employees, but once it grants the employees the privilege of occasional personal use of the telephone during worktime, including the privilege of calling other employees at work, it would appear that it could not lawfully exclude the Union as a subject of discussion particularly where, as here, no actual work interference has been shown.

There can, of course, be an abuse of any privilege and Respondent would be within its rights to police any abuses. But, I conclude, absent any such abuse not shown here, it was unlawful for Respondent to disparately apply its phone policy in the manner it did here. See K-Mart Corporation, 255 NLRB 922 (1981). Thus, I find and conclude that under the circumstances here Respondent discriminated against Kiel in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (l) in limiting her personal use of her business telephone including barring her from union discussions or solicitations.

Moreover, although not alleged in the compalint, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by maintaining an overly broad no-solicitation rule in its employee handbook. Respondent itself submitted the rule in evidence and has relied on it in defense of other complaint allegations to the extent that the legality of the rule has been brought into issue. Under such circumstances, the absence of a complaint allegation does not preclude the finding of the violation which I have made on the rule. See Jax Mold & Machine, Inc., 255 NLRB 942 (1981); The Timken Company, supra.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By removing notices of union meetings from its bulletin boards; by confiscating notices of Union meetings from its employees; by removing an employee petition concerning union and protected concerted activities from a nonwork area; by threatening employees with loss of personal leave and sick leave benefits if they selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative; by soliciting employees to report the identity of other employees who engage in union activity or ask them to sign union cards; and by maintaining a no-solicitation rule which prohibits employees from soliciting for the Union in work areas during their nonworking time, Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By discriminatorily restricting its employee Jean Kiel in personal conversations and the use of its telephones, and by threatening Kiel with discipline for the violation of such unlawful restrictions Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and that it take certain affirmative action necessary to remedy the unfair labor practices and to effectuate the policies of the Act, to include the usual posting of appropriate notices. In my opinion, since the unfair labor practices found herein directly affected employees of two of Respondent's Oak Ridge plant facilities, and because the policies of Respondent underlying the violation found, particularly with respect to bulletin board useage, telephone useage, and no-solicitation rule appear to be applicable to all of the Oak Ridge plant facilities, effectuation of the policies of the Act will best be achieved by requiring Respondent to post the notices to employees hereinafter recommended at all three of the Oak Ridge facilities.

With respect to the reprimand of Jean Kiel the record does not establish that such reprimand amounted to any more than a threat of discipline. There was no showing the threat was ever reduced to written form nor does it appear that any record was made of any disciplinary action regarding Kiel. Thus, there appears to be no basis for an order for expunging any respondent record on Kiel. However, Respondent shall be ordered to retract the threat of discipline of Kiel and so advise her in writing.

Upon the foregoing findings of facts, conclusions of law, and the entire record and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended

ORDER[8]

The Respondent, Union Carbide Corporation-Nuclear Division, Oak Ridge, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Unlawfully removing from its bulletin boards notices of meetings of Office and Professional Employees International Union, AFL-CIO.

(b) Unlawfully confiscating from employees notices of union meetings or other union-related material.

(c) Unlawfully removing employee petitions concerning union or protected concerted activity from nonwork areas.

(d) Threatening loss of personal leave and sick leave benefits if employees select a union to represent them.

---

[8] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(e) Soliciting employees to report the identity of other employees who engaged in union activity or ask them to sign union cards.

(f) Discriminatorily restricting employees in their personal conversations at work or in the personal use of telephones or threatening with discipline employees who breach such restrictions.

(g) Maintaining a no-solicitation rule which prohibits employees from soliciting for unions in work areas during their nonworking time.

(h) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Retract the threat of discipline issued to Jean Kiel and so advise Kiel in writing.

(b) Post at its three Oak Ridge, Tennessee, plant facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being duly signed by a representative of Respondent, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for a period of 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 10, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps it has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed only insofar as it alleges unfair labor practices not found herein.

On September 4, 1981, Administrative Law Judge John C. Miller issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that all other allegations not found violative of the Act are hereby dismissed.

APPENDIX

GENERAL BAPTIST NURSING HOME, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOHN C. MILLER, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me in St. Louis, Missouri, on May 11, 1981. The complaint, as amended, alleges, inter alia, that the administrator of the nursing home, Wanda Britt, interrogated employees about union organizational activity at Respondent's facility and that Director of Nursing Louise Cunningham requested that an employee assist Respondent in finding pretextual grounds to discharge an employee because said employee was supporting the Union and its organizational activities. It further alleges that on or about December 15, 1980, Respondent changed the work schedule of employee Esther Fox and thereby caused her constructive discharge and thereafter refused to reinstate her. The complaint alleges that the above conduct was violative of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, herein called the Act.

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings. We also find no merit to Respondent's assertions that the Administrative Law Judge's findings are irreconcilable and that the case should be remanded for a rehearing by another administrative law judge.

[2] In the absence of exceptions, we find it unnecessary to consider the Administrative Law Judge's finding on the supervisory status of Licensed Practical Nurses Farmer and Romaine, and whether Nursing Home Administrator Britt and Director of Nursing Cunningham unlawfully had requested them to keep Respondent informed about the union activity of other employees.

[3] In accordance with his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth therein.

259 NLRB No. 132

On the entire record in this case, including the briefs of the parties and my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following finings

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

It is alleged and admitted[1] that Respondent during the 12-month period ending February 28, 1981, derived gross revenues in excess of $100,000 from the operation of its Campbell, Missouri, facility and that it purchased and caused to be transported to such facility goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which were transported to its facility in Campbell, Missouri, from points located outside the State of Missouri. On the above undisputed facts, I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

It is further alleged and admitted, and I find, that Meatcutters Local Union No. 88, United Food & Commercial Workers, AFL-CIO/CLC, is at all times material a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE ALLEGATIONS

A. 8(a)(1) Allegations

1. It is alleged that Wanda Britt, administrator of the nursing home, interrogated employees about the Union's organizational drive in telephone calls on or about December 8, 1980.

Dana Farmer, a former employee of Respondent from August 1979 through April 10, 1981, testified that she was employed as a licensed practical nurse (LPN hereafter) and in that position monitored and oversaw patient care. She testified credibly that on December 9, 1980, she stopped to pick up her children at a fellow employee's home and learned that one of the women, also employed at the nursing home, had gone to a meeting. When she inquired if it involved the Union, the husband of one of the women present did not respond but merely grinned. Ultimately, Dana Farmer said she later learned that Esther Fox had picked up a fellow employee, and that they had gone to Malden for a union meeting. After several telephone conversations with Louise Cunningham, director of nursing, about this unusual activity among the nurses aides, Farmer and another LPN, Terry Romaine, were informed by Cunningham that Britt had been informed and to let her (Cunningham) know if they found out anything else.

That same evening, Farmer and Romaine, called Britt directly and asked her what they should do, that they did not want a union. At that point, Britt merely advised them to tell her if anything else developed, and that LPNs would not be in the unit. The testimony established that Dana Farmer and Terry Romaine called Britt and informed her of the union activities of other employees. I find, therefore, that the information was voluntarily given by Farmer and Romaine and was not derived from by interrogation on the part of Britt. While Britt did ask them to keep her advised of developments I find it insufficient to support a finding of interrogation. Accordingly, absent other evidence of interrogation, I recommend that the allegation that Britt unlawfully interrogated employees about union activities be dismissed.[2]

However, the evidence as to the supervisory status of LPNs discloses that, at Respondent's facility, LPNs served as charge nurses. They worked 12-hour shifts and monitored the work of some 15 people composed of nurses aides and orderlies. The complement of LPNs consisted of five full-time LPNs and one part-timer. The only registered nurse in the home was the director of nursing who worked an 8-hour shift. Consequently, for 16 hours a day, the LPN there was the only authority in charge. The LPNs had the authority to reprimand nurses aides and orderlies, orally and in writing, which could result in their ultimate discharge. The General Counsel contends that the LPNs here are employees and cites Shadecrest Health Care Center, 228 NLRB 1081 (1977), Sunset Nursing Home, Inc., d/b/a North Miami Convalescent Home, 224 NLRB 1271 (1976), and Pinecrest Convalescent Home, Inc., 222 NLRB 13 (1976), as authority. While I personally disagree with the Board's findings in those cases, I am bound by Board precedent. While I find it unnecessary to make a finding here in view of my dismissal of the allegation involving alleged interrogation of Farmer by Britt, the record here is similar to the cases cited. In the event Board disposition of this case may require such a finding, I would find the LPNs here employees based on the above-cited precedent.

2. It is alleged that Louise Cunningham, director of nursing, on or about December 10, 1980, requested that an employee assist Respondent in finding grounds to discharge an employee believed to be supporting the Union by reporting deficiences in work performance which would constitute a pretext for discharge.

Dana Farmer credibly testified that around 8 p.m. on December 10, 1980, Cunningham called her and advised Farmer that Administrator Britt was going to get rid of Fox the next day because Fox was a "troublemaker." Cunningham then asked Farmer if she knew of anything Respondent could get on Fox. Farmer replied that Fox was doing her job, but her attitude was not perfect. Cunningham responded that Respondent would have had something if it could have proven that Fox was taking too long for lunch or for her breaks. Cunningham did not specifically deny Farmer's testimony.[3] I find that, irrespective of whether Farmer be deemed a supervisor or an employee, Cunningham's request was discriminatorily motivated because it was an effort to develop a pretextual reason to discharge Fox. Cunningham's conduct constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[1] Respondent entered into a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election (G.C. Exh. 8), which sets forth stipulated facts on commerce.

[2] The consent election agreement permitted LPNs to vote subject to challenge.

[3] To the extent Cunningham's testimony conflicts with that of Farmer, I do not credit it.

3. It is alleged that sometime in January 1981 Administrator Wanda Britt asked an employee to watch another employee believed to be supportive of the Union and to report on the activities of such employee.

Theresa Romaine testified that sometime in January 1981 Britt asked her to keep an eye on Ruby Snider's job performance. In a previous conversation with Cunningham, in early December 1980 Farmer had identified Ruby Snider as one of the nurses aides attending a union meeting. Such information in turn had been reported to Britt by Cunningham. There is no evidence indicating that there were any complaints about her work until she became interested in union representation and attended union meetings. Accordingly, this surveillance of her work performance was prompted solely by her union activities. I find that the requested surveillance of Snider's work was discriminatorily motivated and is violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

B. 8(a)(3) Allegations

It is alleged that on or about December 15, 1980, Respondent advised employee Esther Fox of a change in her work schedule thereby causing her termination and that, thereafter, Respondent refused and failed to reinstate Esther Fox to her former or substantially equivalent position, and that all such actions were caused by Esther Fox's union or protected concerted activities.

Esther Fox, alleged discriminatee herein, credibly testified that, in October 1980, she contacted one Una Moore, a union steward of Local 88, Meatcutters, and asked about getting a union into her place of employment. Later in October 1980, she met Bill Blassie, representative of the Meatcutters Local. On November 11, she attended another union meeting with Bill Blassie. In early December, specifically December 8, 1980, she and other employees of Respondent went to another union meeting in the town of Malden. On December 15, 1980, Fox was called into the office of Carolyn Stuart, who had become the director of nursing after December 12, 1980. In her office Fox met with Wanda Britt, the administrator of the nursing home, and Stuart, at which time Britt announced that there was going to be a change in Fox's work schedule and that she would rotate shifts like other nurses aides. Prior to this meeting and with the exception of a 6- to 8- week period in 1980, Fox had served in the job classification of bath nurse. Instead of working 8 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., as in the past, she would be on a schedule of 7 a.m. to 3 p.m. and thereafter would be rotated along with other nurses aides into the position of bath nurse. Fox became upset and announced that it was difficult for her to get to work for the earlier shift and said that she would have to resign. Britt advised her to think about it, telling her that Respondent would hate to lose her. At that time, Fox went ahead and wrote a letter of resignation. As her reason for rejecting the new schedule, Fox testified that, although her family had two cars, there were two other women plus her son that rode with her and that changing that shift would affect her carpool and possibly her ability to get any transportation to work. The following day, Fox had another conversation with Wanda Britt and requested that she be permitted to withdraw her resignation, Britt responded that she would have to think it over, noting that Fox had already resigned and that she had a bad record. Ultimately, Britt rejected Fox's request to withdraw her resignation. Fox continued to work until the end of December 1980 when she was terminated.

With respect to Fox, Farmer testified credibly that she had two conversations with Cunningham on December 10, 1980, and in the first conversation she gave Cunningham additional details about 10 people who went to the union meeting. In the process, she listed some of the names, including that of Esther Fox, Ruby Snider, Agnes Jones, and Jeanie Coleman who attended the meeting, but she did not know the names of others who attended. About half an hour later the same night, Cunningham called Farmer and informed her that Britt was going to get rid of Fox the next day because she was a "troublemaker." Cunningham told Farmer not to let anyone know that Britt knew about the Union or the Union's activities. On December 11, 1980, Farmer called Cunningham and asked what happened with Esther Fox. Cunningham replied that Britt had talked to her attorney who told Britt that she should not fire Fox because she could get in trouble with the Union. Cunningham then stated, "You ought to see the job description I have made out for Esther. It will be hard on her." On December 12, 1980, Farmer approached Cunningham and asked if Cunningham had given Fox her job description. Cunningham stated that Fox had been sick that day and that Britt and Carolyn Stewart, the new director of nursing, would present it to Fox on Monday, December 15, 1980.

The evidence is undisputed that Cunningham and Britt were aware of Fox's union activities and that, whether or not they were aware that she was the prime instigator, they were aware that she had picked up a fellow employee to attend a union meeting. The evidence is also undisputed that when Fox had been off in June 1980, for an operation, Fox was assigned nurses aide duties for a while because she could not perform the bath nurse's functions which included lifting patients. At that time Fox informed Cunningham that this change in hours (from 8 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. to 7 a.m. to 3 p.m.) caused her transportation problems. Added to this is the testimony of Farmer, which I credit, that after learning that Fox was involved in a union meeting Cunningham reported that fact to Britt who stated that Fox was a troublemaker and would be terminated.

Viewed in this context, and in light of its timing, I find that the change in Fox's hours was motivated by a desire to make it difficult for Fox to continue working and force Fox to quit her job. Fox did resign as a result of this change in work schedule. The following day Fox attempted to retract her resignation and Britt refused saying that Fox had already quit and that she had a bad record. Fox denied Britt's accusation, stating that her evaluations were always good.

I have reviewed the treatment afforded Doris Foster, another employee whom Respondent took back as a part-time employee, after she left full-time employment as a nurses aide with a 1 day's oral notice. Respondent, through Stewart, its director of nursing, went out of her way to inform Foster when she could take an examination to better qualify herself for employment. The treatment afforded Foster contrasts starkly with the treatment of Esther Fox, who was not permitted to retract her resignation. I find that Respondent's change in Fox's work schedule was discriminatorily motivated with an intent to make it difficult for Fox to retain her job. I find that her resignation was forced and I find it to be a constructive discharge. I further find that Respondent's refusal to permit Fox to withdraw her resignation was also discriminatorily motivated. Both the constructive discharge and the refusal to permit her to withdraw her resignation I find violative of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Charging Party, Meatcutters Local Union No. 88, United Food & Commercial Workers, AFL-CIO/CLC, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

6. Except as found herein, all other allegations of the complaint are dismissed.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DONALD R. HOLLEY, Administrative Law Judge: Upon an original charge and an amended charge filed by Alex B. Youstic (herein called the Charging Party or Youstic), the Acting Regional Director for Region 6 of the National Labor Relations Board (herein called the Board), issued a complaint on April 24, 1980, alleging, inter alia, that Harbison-Walker Refractories, Division of Dresser Industries, Inc. (herein called Respondent), discharged Youstic on September 10, 1979, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (herein called the Act). Respondent filed a timely answer denying that it had engaged in the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint.

The case was heard in Clearfield, Pennsylvania, on October 10, 1980. Subsequently, the parties filed briefs which have been carefully considered.

259 NLRB No. 133

Upon the entire record and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses while they testified, I make the following:

Findings of Fact

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a Delaware corporation, operates three refractory brick plants in Clearfield, Pennsylvania. Its No. 2 plant is the only plant directly involved in this proceeding. During the 12-month period preceding issuance of the complaint, Respondent purchased from suppliers located outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000, and during the same period it sold finished products valued in excess of $50,000 to customers located outside said State. It is admitted, and I find, that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. STATUS OF LABOR ORGANIZATION

It is admitted, and I find, that United Steelworkers of America, Local 75, AFL-CIO-CLC, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Respondent's Business Operation

Respondent operates three brick plants in the Clearfield, Pennsylvania, area. Prior to midsummer of 1979,[1] it had operated its No. 2 plant with a skeleton crew of 15–20 employees. Those employees manufactured brick at the plant, but it was sent to the No. 3 plant for burning in the kiln.

At some unstated time, Respondent received a sizeable order for coke oven brick and decided to reactivate the kiln at its No. 2 plant to produce the order. Such decision dictated that the size of the work force be increased to approximately 70 employees. Alex Youstic, several supervisory personnel, and others were hired as a result of the expansion.[2]

B. The General Counsel's Case

Youstic was hired as a maintenance mechanic by Respondent at its No. 2 plant on August 6. He was terminated on September 11, shortly before the end of his 240-hour probationary period. Counsel for the General Counsel contends that Youstic frequently complained because employees other than maintenance mechanics performed maintenance work during his short tenure, and Respondent terminated him because he engaged in such protected concerted and/or union activity. She sought to prove her contention through the testimony of Youstic and employees Anthony Spagnolo, Pete Pontillo, Randy Starck, and Nicholos Nylwalk. The pertinent testimony given by such employees is summarized below.

When Youstic was hired, Respondent operated its No. 2 plant around the clock. He testified he was originally assigned to the second shift (7 a.m. to 3 p.m.) where he was to receive training in the maintenance of brick presses from Anthony Spagnolo, a 40-year employee who also happened to be the recording secretary of the Union. Youstic testified he worked on the day shift with Spagnolo for 2 weeks and that during that period he and Spagnolo discussed the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and Respondent, with Spagnolo emphasizing the work jurisdictional rights of maintenance mechanics.[3] During one of the conversations, Youstic claims he told Spagnolo he had observed the third-shift foreman, Albert Mayer, operate a brick press while operators just stood around and watched.[4]

Several weeks into his employment, Youstic was working on the 3 to 11 p.m. shift when employee Randy Starck, a press operator, put a brand on a brick mold. At the time, Youstic was working with maintenance mechanic Dave Davis, who had been hired shortly before Youstic was hired. Youstic brought Starck's activity to Davis' attention and informed him that he (Davis) rather than Starck should be performing the work which was maintenance mechanic's work. He also told Davis that there was a possibility that a grievance could be filed against him for permitting an operator to perform maintenance work.

According to Youstic, Foreman Mayer approached him the day after the above-described incident and informed him he had received a complaint that Youstic had been snapping at the men. Youstic claims he told Mayer he had not realized he had snapped at anyone and, if he had, he had not done it maliciously. Youstic testified that he later told several employees of his conversation with Mayer and indicated to them that if they had done the complaining he wanted them to know he had not intended to snap at them.

On September 7, a Friday, Youstic and others were asked to work a double shift because the floor of the kiln had heaved up when it was activated and several cars loaded with brick were wedged between the roof and the floor of the kiln. Youstic testified that, at the beginning of the 3 to 11 p.m. shift, he and maintenance mechanic Davis were assigned to perform maintenance work on brick presses and all the other employees were taken by Foreman Mayer to the kiln where they attempted to remove the stuck cars and brick by cutting the cars with a torch to facilitate their removal. Sometime during the evening, Local Union President Pete Pontillo approached Youstic and asked where the rest of the men were. Youstic told him they were all in the kiln with Mayer. According to Youstic, Pontillo entered the kiln, came back out with Foreman Mayer and the entire crew, and Pontillo and Mayer then conversed in an office for

[2] Supervision of employees working at the No. 2 plant at all times material was accomplished by: John F. Strathen, manager of Respondent's three Clearfield plants; Walter Clark, general foreman of the No. 2 plant; William H. Teufel, personnel manager; and Shift Foremen Albert Mayer, Jeffrey Peteuil, and Alan Fisch. It was admitted, and I find, that such individuals are agents of Respondent and are supervisors within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) and (13) of the Act.

[3] Respondent's payroll records reveal Youstic was transferred to the 3 to 11 p.m. shift 1 week after he was hired.

[4] No grievance was filed as a result of the discussion and the record fails to reveal that management learned of it.

1-2 hours while the employees stood around doing nothing.[5]

After Pontillo came out of the kiln, Youstic spoke with his fellow mechanic, Davis, and informed him that Pontillo was concerned with contract violations. He further indicated that, if he had not been a probationary employee, he would have filed a grievance. As Davis had then completed his probationary period, Youstic suggested that he file a grievance. Davis failed to indicate whether he would file one. Later the same night, Youstic spoke with forklift operator Witherow, indicating that Witherow and Starck had violated the contract by performing the work of maintenance mechanics. According to Youstic, Witherow told him he felt they should all work together to get the kiln repaired so no employees would be laid off.[6] Youstic informed Witherow he believed he would file a grievance.

According to Youstic, he last worked at Respondent on Monday, September 10. He testified that, at the end of his shift that day, Mayer, who was accompanied by first-shift Foreman Peteuil, told him he was sorry but he had to let him go. What was said thereafter is in dispute. Youstic's version is that he asked the reason and Mayer initially told him he was not cooperating with or getting along with the other employees. Youstic contends he disagreed and asked if he could bid onto a different shift. He claims Mayer replied that he did not think Youstic was a good employee for Harbison-Walker; that he knew there was a lot of union activity going on in No. 3 plant—people filing grievances and so forth—and he did not want this going on in his plant as he wanted a perfect shift. Youstic testified Mayer told him he was a good mechanic but he could not use him because he could not get along with people.[7]

On the morning following his termination, Youstic went to the plant to see General Foreman Walter Clark. When he arrived, Clark was not in and he spoke with the maintenance foreman, Alan Fisch. When Youstic told Fisch he had been terminated, Fisch asked the reason. Youstic told him Mayer felt he had not been cooperative and could not get along with people. Youstic claims Fisch replied that did not sound right because he had worked with him and had no problems with him. At that point Clark came in and indicated he was aware Youstic had been fired the night before, and Youstic asked him if there was any possibility of him bidding on another job. According to Youstic, Clark told him he could not bid on another job and indicated he would back up his foreman who he understood had decided to fire Youstic because he was not cooperating or getting along well with other employees and he had been observed talking to union officials and that was enough cause for him to be terminated.

After speaking with Clark, Youstic visited Respondent's personnel manager, William Teufel. Youstic testified Teufel reiterated that he had been fired because he was uncooperative and did not get along well. Youstic stated he asked Teufel if his speaking with union officials had anything to do with his getting fired and Teufel replied, "No, that's not true, that has nothing to do with it." Youstic asked Teufel if he could bid into a different job and Teufel said no, that he did not think Youstic would be a good employee for Harbison-Walker.

About 2 weeks after his termination, Youstic returned to the plant to pick up his last paycheck. On that occasion, which he places as occurring on Wednesday, September 27, he claims he visited the office of John Strathen, manager of all three plants. During this conversation Youstic claims Strathen stated that Mayer told him Youstic was not cooperating with the men and could not get along well, and also that he had been seen talking to union officials. Youstic asked if there were any possibility of work in a different area and Strathen replied that he would look into it, but that Youstic should not get his hopes up. Strathen further stated that if he had been present at the time that Youstic had been fired things might have worked out differently.

While the General Counsel's case is largely dependent upon my acceptance of Youstic's testimony, supportive testimony was offered through employee witnesses Spagnolo, Pontillo, Starck, and Nylwalk. Spagnolo, who trained Youstic and thereafter remained in daily contact with the employee, testified he got along with Youstic and observed no conflict between Youstic and other employees. Additionally, he testified he could not recall any other probationary employees being fired during his 40 years at Respondent. He indicated he knew several employees who are hard to get along with who are still working at Respondent.[8]

Employee Pontillo testified that prior to Youstic's termination some of the employees told him they had been irritated by Youstic on occasion because he felt he knew everything. The first time he heard it, Pontillo stated he went to Youstic and told him to watch what he was doing because he was on probation. While Pontillo corroborated Youstic's testimony that Youstic had informed him others were performing mechanics' work in the kiln, he testified he did not tell Mayer or any other supervisor that Youstic had complained. According to Pontillo, when he entered the kiln on the occasion in question, he saw Witherow doing mechanics' work and he told Mayer if he had Witherow do the work he would have to pay a mechanic who was at home. Pontillo described the conversation with Mayer as a friendly one which lasted a minute or two.

[5] I do not credit Youstic's testimony that Mayer met with Pontillo for 1-2 hours while the men did nothing. Pontillo and Foreman Peteuil, who claims Pontillo spoke to him rather than Mayer on the occasion under discussion, both claim the discussion took just a few minutes.

[6] Prior to the occasion described, Witherow, a former construction foreman, had informed Youstic he had no use for unions.

[7] In a letter to the Regional Office placed in the record as G.C. Exh. 2a, Youstic described his termination, stating:

> At the end of the shift, Al Mayer called me in the office and said he would have to let me go. He said he could not let me continue working because I had 237 hours of a "240 hour probation period completed and after that he couldn't get rid of me"! He said his reason was that I did not get along with the men! He said he was satisfied with my work but that he wanted a "perfect shift."

Similarly, in his pretrial affidavit, Youstic indicated Mayer stated the reason for his decision to discharge was "that I did not get along with the men . . . he was satisfied with my work but wanted a perfect shift."

[8] The record reveals that such employees are regular employees who have completed their probationary period.

Press operator Randy Starck indicated during his testimony that, on an occasion in early September, employee Witherow came to the kiln and informed him, in the presence of Foreman Mayer and Peteuil, that Youstic had told him (Witherow) he was going to file a grievance for running a torch in the kiln. He testified he thought Mayer may have heard Witherow's comments. Starck agreed when he appeared as a witness that he had stated in his pretrial affidavit that Youstic had an abrasive personality, felt he knew more than anyone else, and was always giving orders.

Employee Nick Nylwalk, the General Counsel's last witness, testified he is a maintenance mechanic on the day shift, that he had worked with Youstic and could say nothing against him. He indicated he was unaware of any other probationary employees being fired prior to the time Youstic was terminated.

C. Respondent's Defense

Respondent claims the sole reason for its decision to terminate Youstic during his probationary period was the fact that he had an abusive personality and could not work in harmony with other employees. Management officials Strathen, Clark, and Mayer vigorously denied saying anything to Youstic at or near the time of his termination which would indicate in any way that his participation in union activities caused his termination.

Youstic's immediate supervisor, Mayer, testified that, within a short time after Youstic transferred to the 3 to 11 p.m. shift, he learned, through direct observation and through comments made by employees to him, that employees Steve Webb, Dave Davis, Oliver Smeal, Wayne Witherow, and Randy Starck did not care for Youstic and did not want to work with him.[9]

While Mayer did not indicate precisely when the employees named above complained to him, he testified the complaints caused him to inform General Foreman Clark of the complaints at a foremen's meeting held on August 23. Mayer claims he then told Clark he did not think Youstic would make it through the probationary period.

Clark testified that he discussed the Youstic situation with Personnel Manager Teufel after the August 23 meeting and Teufel agreed to attend the next meeting scheduled for August 30.[10] While Clark and Mayer claim they told Teufel at the August 30 foremen's meeting that they wanted to terminate Youstic before the end of his probationary period, the record reveals Teufel informed them Youstic should be warned before they terminated him.

As revealed above, Mayer did not actually warn Youstic in accordance with Teufel's suggestion. Instead, he merely told him employees had complained to him that he had been snapping at the men.

Mayer and Clark both indicated during their testimony that Youstic was discussed once again at the foremen's meeting held on September 6, and they decided at that time he would be terminated before the end of his probationary period. Teufel testified that Clark informed him on September 6 or 7 that Youstic had not improved and they still wanted to fire him.

Turning to the Friday, September 7, incident in the kiln, General Foreman Clark testified the kiln was operative throughout the month of August and malfunctioned on September 3 rather than in mid-August as indicated by Youstic. While Youstic claimed that Pontillo and Mayer left the kiln and talked in an office for 1–2 hours on Friday evening while the men just stood around, Mayer testified Pontillo did not speak with him at all on the occasion in question—that the discussion was with Peteuil, foreman for the 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. shift. Peteuil, Peteuil corroborated Mayer and claimed, as had Pontillo, that the conversation lasted only a minute or two. Clark testified Pontillo told him the next morning that several employees had been working out of their job classifications in the kiln the night before.[11]

According to Mayer, he realized during the 3 to 11 p.m. shift on Tuesday, September 11, that overtime would be included when determining when a probationary employee had completed 240 hours of work and this caused him to check Youstic's hours. In checking, he determined that Youstic could not work another shift without exceeding 240 hours, and that discovery led him to call Personnel Manager Teufel at home during the dinner hour to obtain clearance to terminate Youstic. Teufel concurred in his recommendation and advised that Mayer inform Youstic of his fate in the presence of Shift Foreman Peteuil when the latter came to work at or about 10:30 p.m.

Mayer testified he called Youstic into the office at or about 10:30 p.m. and informed him he was sorry but he was going to have to let him go. When Youstic indicated he could not understand why he was being fired, Mayer asserts he explained he just did not fit in with his crew and he wanted a crew that worked together. Thereafter, Mayer informed Youstic he had to make the decision right then because his probationary period was ending and he had decided he did not want him on his shift. Mayer recalled he indicated he wished he had another alternative, like trying Youstic on a different shift, but he had no such option. Mayer denied that he made any reference to the Union during the discussion.

Clark acknowledged during his testimony that Youstic came to see him in his office the morning after he was terminated. His account of the discussion was that he merely indicated Mayer had informed him he had decided on the action because Youstic could not get along with other people on his shift, and he was abiding by

---

[9] Mayer indicated he witnessed an altercation between press operator Webb and Youstic during which Youstic told Webb to turn his machine over and Webb took offense indicating Youstic was not his boss. He testified that Smeal, an equipment operator, complained to him that "you could not tell Youstic anything" and asserted that employee Davis told him the same thing. He testified Witherow may have told him Youstic complained because he (Witherow) and Starck operated a torch in the kiln, and that Starck relayed messages concerning Youstic to him in the lunchroom.

[10] The persons normally attending such meetings were Clark, his three shift foremen, and the maintenance foreman.

[11] Pontillo indicated that his technique was to simply advise the new management officials at the No. 2 plant informally when they did something which might constitute a contract violation. He also indicated his approach caused correction of such situations without animosity or the necessity for filing of a formal grievance.

Mayer's decision and would back him up. Clark indicated he asked Youstic at the time if Mayer had talked to him about getting along with others, and Youstic replied he had but in his view the problems he had with other people on the shift were not that major and Mayer was wrong.

Personnel Manager Teufel also verified the fact that Youstic spoke with him the morning after his termination. Teufel subsequently reduced his conversations with Youstic to writing as Mrs. Youstic telephoned him later in the day and threatened to go to the NLRB. Teufel's memorandum was placed in the record as Respondent's Exhibit 2. It states:

> On Wednesday, September 12, 1979, Alex Youstic requested to discuss his termination in his probationary period with me. Alex claimed his termination was unfair and his supervisor Al Mayer had made a wrong decision. Alex explained he was terminated because of his inability to work well with his peers and that was an untrue statement on Mayer's part. Alex first claimed he was never talked to about this and later said Mayer did tell him about 2 weeks ago that "he snapped at the men." When questioned Alex stated that was all Mayer said; however, further in the discussion Alex said Mayer told him of his inability to work well with his peers.
> I explained to Alex that his inability to work well with his peers had been discussed with me previously and that was the reason this problem was discussed with him. I further explained the need for a cohesive work group and that Mayer was his supervisor and his instructions should be followed unless it would endanger an employee's safety. If Alex felt Mayer had made a poor decision on work assignments he could question Mayer; however, Alex had questioned Mayer on a frequent basis and even with his peers he questioned their suggestions and recommendations.
> Alex then began saying he had 5 children and a wife to support and his image in the community would be discolored because of his termination and requested consideration for re-employment. I explained there was nothing the Company could do and that he should not allow this situation to destroy his life. Alex claimed he would not let this situation die and would do something about it.
> 9/12/79 Mrs. Youstic called and stated she and her husband were retaining an attorney and would process his claim to the NLRB. She was very pleasant and understanding but did not agree with anything I said.

Finally, Respondent's manager of all three Clearfield plants, Strathen, testified that Youstic came to his office to discuss the termination on a date he could not recall. Strathen testified Youstic wanted to know why he had been terminated and he explained to him that the shift foremen, the plant manager, and the personnel manager said that he could not get along with people and he was terminated for that reason. Strathen denied that he said anything at the time about union activities or anything of that nature. He indicated he makes a final decision on discharge upon the recommendation of the shift foreman, the plant manager, and the personnel manager. He testified his recollection was that he had talked to Clark, Mayer, and Teufel the day before Youstic's discharge and had concurred in the decision to terminate Youstic at that time.

D. Analysis and Conclusions

The instant case poses two basic issues. The first is whether Youstic's version of his conversations with Mayer, Clark, and Strathen is reliable, and the second is whether the reason advanced by Respondent for its decision to terminate Youstic is a pretext advanced to mask an unlawful motivation for the decision to terminate the employee. I resolve the first issue in Respondent's favor and the second in the General Counsel's favor for the reasons indicated below.

While the statements attributed by Youstic to management officials Mayer (grievances at No. 3 plant and he desired a perfect shift), Clark (Youstic seen talking to union officials and that was enough reason for discharge), and Strathen (essentially the same comment allegedly made by Clark) would establish, prima facie, if credited, that Respondent terminated Youstic in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3), I cannot credit such testimony. Youstic was not a particularly impressive witness and he was unable to explain to my satisfaction why he failed to include in his original letter to the Board and in his subsequent investigative affidavit Mayer's alleged reference to a large number of grievances being filed at the No. 3 plant and his (Mayer's) desire to keep such activity away from his shift. Thus, as to the Mayer-Youstic conversation, I credit Mayer. Similarly, I refrain from crediting Youstic's assertion that Clark and Strathen told him one of the reasons for his termination was that he had been observed talking to union officials. In the first instance, Respondent caused Youstic to be trained by the Union's recording secretary, Spagnolo. Neither Spagnolo nor Youstic gave any testimony which would indicate that either ever informed management officials that they discussed anything other than work-related subjects. The only other union official Youstic talked to was Union President Pontillo and the record reveals Respondent's supervisors were in the kiln at the time and that neither Pontillo nor Youstic told any management officials any details of the conversation. Added to the above observations are Youstic's assertion that he discussed his termination with the Union and was informed they could do nothing about it and the fact that he did not seek NLRB assistance until more than 5 months after the termination. All considered, I cannot accept Youstic's claim that Clark and Strathen told him after his termination that he had been fired because he had been seen talking to union officials. The record facts and Youstic's post-termination actions convince me the testimony is not reliable.

Although I have not credited the direct evidence offered by the General Counsel which was intended to prove that Respondent terminated Youstic for discriminatory reasons, I am nevertheless convinced that he was discharged because he had displayed a propensity to question the work assignments made by Foreman Mayer.

According to the scenario advanced by Respondent, Mayer and Clark concurred in the feeling that they would have to fire Youstic before the end of his probationary period as early as August 23. Teufel, the personnel manager, was so informed between August 23 and 30, and he attended the foremen's meeting held at the No. 2 plant on August 30 and advised that Youstic be warned. As indicated above, Mayer thereafter reprimanded rather than warned the employee and, according to both him and General Foreman Clark, they reported to Teufel on or immediately after September 6 that their final decision was that Youstic had to go. Although Teufel purportedly concurred in their decision, Youstic was not terminated until the end of his shift on September 11. In the interim, the kiln incident occurred and Mayer and Clark both admit they heard through the grapevine that Youstic had complained because others were doing mechanics' work. Moreover, during the interim period, Manager Strathen claims he talked to Teufel, Clark, and Mayer and decided the day before Youstic was terminated that their recommendation that the employee should be terminated should be accepted. Finally, for some reason, which was not adequately explained, Mayer telephoned Teufel at home on the night of the actual discharge to obtain his approval of his contemplated action.

Viewing the chronology of events set forth above, it appears to me that the final decision to fire Youstic was made on Monday, September 10, rather than on Thursday, September 6. In addition to the fact that Strathen indicated this was the case, I note that Mayer's Tuesday evening telephone call would have seemingly been unnecessary if the final decision had been reached on September 6.[18] Patently, if the decision to discharge was made on Monday, it was made immediately after Mayer and Clark learned that Youstic had indicated he might file a grievance because others had been assigned to perform the work of maintenance mechanics in the kiln over the weekend. While all of Respondent's witnesses claim that Youstic's efforts to enforce the collective-bargaining contract had nothing to do with his termination, the memorandum prepared by Teufel on September 13 belies such claims. Thus, in the memorandum, Teufel stated, inter alia:[19]

> I explained to Alex that his inability to work well with his peers had been discussed with me previously and that was the reason this problem was discussed with him. I further explained the need for a cohesive work group and that Mayer was his supervisor and his instructions should be followed unless it would endanger an employee's safety. If Alex felt Mayer had made a poor decision on work assignments he could question Mayer, however, Alex had questioned Mayer on a frequent basis and even with his peers he questioned their suggestdons and recommendations. [Emphasis supplied.]

In sum, careful review of the entire record in this case convinces one that the testimony given by Respondent's witnesses Mayer, Clark, Teufel, and Strathen regarding the reason for the decision to terminate Youstic is no more reliable than Youstic's account of what was said to him at the time of discharge. It is clear that Teufel refused to approve line supervision's recommendation that Youstic be terminated because he could not get along with other employees on August 30; it is equally clear that he and Strathen subsequently approved a recommendation that Youstic be fired on September 10 and 11, respectively. The record reveals the only significant event which occurred during the interim period was the kiln incident. As Mayer and Clark were admittedly aware that Youstic had informed other employees at the time of that incident, that he felt a grievance should be filed over the incident and Teufel made pointed reference to the fact that Youstic had questioned Mayer's work assignment decisions in the memorandum previously discussed, I infer that top management was motivated to agree the employee should be fired when informed of his actions during the kiln incident. Accordingly, I find, as alleged, that Respondent terminated Alex Youstic because he engaged in protected concerted and/or union activities. By engaging in such conduct, it violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act as alleged.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By discharging Alex B. Youstic on September 11, 1979, because he engaged in protected concerted and/or union activities, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

4. Respondent has not engaged in any unfair labor practices other than those specifically found herein.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent will be required to offer Alex B. Youstic reinstatement to his former position of employment or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, dismissing, if necessary, anyone who may have been hired to perform the work which he had been performing. Additionally, Respondent will be ordered to make this employee whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered by reason of his unlawful termination with backpay to be computed on a quarterly basis, less his net earnings during such period, with backpay and interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289

---

[18] Mayer offered no real explanation for the telephone call. He indicated he computed the number of hours Youstic had worked on September 11 "for some reason, whether I received another you know, another complaint or what."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On October 19, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Robert T. Wallace issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Special Service Delivery, Inc., Highland, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT T. WALLACE, Administrative Law Judge: Upon a charge filed by Thomas Lew, an individual, against Special Service Delivery, Inc. (herein Respondent), a complaint was issued on July 9, 1980, in which it is alleged that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, by according premature recognition to Teamsters Local Union No. 486, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (herein Local 486), as the exclusive bargaining representative of employees at its facility in Highland, Michigan. The case was heard before me in Detroit on February 25, 1981.

Upon the entire record, and after due consideration of the brief filed by Respondent, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a Michigan corporation, is engaged in interstate and intrastate transportation of freight; and, as pertinent, it has a terminal and office in Highland, Michigan. Its annual gross revenues are in excess of $500,000, and it annually delivers within Michigan goods valued in excess of $50,000, which goods moved directly from points located outside the State of Michigan. It admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and that Local 486 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The facts are brief and virtually undisputed. On April 8, 1980, Respondent executed a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 486. The agreement was made effective on April 1, 1980, and was to continue for 3 years. Among other things, it recognized Local 486 as the exclusive representative of all drivers, contained a union-security provision, and provided for monthly deduction (checkoff) of dues and initiation fees of drivers, as well as monthly payments by Respondent to the Michigan Conference of Teamsters Welfare Fund.

At the time the contract was signed, Respondent had no employees and operations in Michigan were not scheduled to begin until June 6, 1980. However, by June 5, it had established its terminal at Highland and had employed 11 drivers to operate out of that facility. On that day, all of the drivers assembled at the Highland facility, having been advised by Respondent that a meeting was to be held at the request of Local 486's business agent. The subject of the meeting was the previously signed collective-bargaining agreement. The business agent states that he apprised the "members" of the contract and expressed his view that it contained one of the best health and welfare programs ever negotiated. He also told them that the 90-day probationary period for new drivers should be changed to 60 days, whereupon he went into an adjoining office and persuaded two representatives of Respondent to agree to that change. The "membership" then asked him about the possibility of including a cost-of-living clause. The agent again went to the office and broached that subject. He returned shortly thereafter and told the drivers that the proposal had been turned down. They accepted the rejection after representatives of management gave reasons why Respondent could not afford such a clause. Finally, it was agreed that several "typographical" changes would be made to correct errors of the business agent in drafting provisions dealing with incentive bonuses.

According to the business agent, the only reference to representation by Local 486 made during the meeting was a comment by the membership to the effect that his office in Saginaw was 80 miles away, while Teamsters Local 337 was in nearby Pontiac, to which the agent responded: "Gentlemen, if you need my services I can be here inside of an hour and a half anytime you need me."

III. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

Respondent is shown knowingly to have recognized Local 486 as the exclusive bargaining agent of its driver employees on April 8, 1980, and well before it had hired any drivers. Although it asserts that the collective-bargaining agreement executed on that date was "conditional" and subject to review and approval by a representative complement of drivers when hired, that claim appears to be entirely unsupported. The agreement contains no indication that its effectiveness was to depend on a subsequent event. On the contrary, it was made unqualifiedly retroactive from April 1. In these circumstances the law is clear. By its premature and exclusive recognition of Local 486, Respondent confronted drivers who were later hired with a fait accompli, thereby interfering with guaranteed organizational rights of employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and gave unlawful support to a labor organization in violation of Section 8(a)(2). International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, AFL-CIO v. N.L.R.B., 366 U.S. 731 (1961), affg. Bernhard-Altman, Texas Corporation, 122 NLRB 1289 (1959).

Respondent, however, argues that any unlawfulness was rendered harmless by subsequent ratification of the agreement by 11 drivers on June 5. That circumstance, assuming it occurred, is irrelevant. Respondent's premature recognition conferred on Local 486 a deceptive cloak of authority with which it would be able persuasively to elicit employee support, and thereby negated any real possibility that a subsequent ratification would be uncoerced. Compare Ladies' Garment Workers', supra.[1]

In any event, ratification is an affirmative defense and, on this record, Respondent has failed to establish that a valid ratification occurred. For example, it does not appear that the drivers who assembled on June 5 were ever told that they had an option to accept or reject Local 486 as their bargaining agent. Instead, Local 486's business agent appears diligently to have kept the focus of the meeting on the merits of the health and welfare package and on his ability to deal with Respondent in the matter of ex post facto changes in the collective-bargaining agreement.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By recognizing Local 486 as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees and by executing a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 486 at a time when Respondent had no employees, and by maintaining such agreement in effect after employees were hired, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights in violation of Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act.

2. The aforesaid actions are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. Specifically, I will order Respondent to withdraw all recognition from Local 486 as the representative of its employees for purposes of collective bargaining unless and until Local 486 has been duly certified by the National Labor Relations Board as the exclusive representative of such employees. I will also order Respondent to cease giving force and effect to the collective-bargaining agreement executed on April 8, 1980, or any renewal, modification, or extension thereof; provided, however, that nothing in the order shall authorize or require the withdrawal or elimination of any wage increase or other benefits, terms, and conditions of employment which may have been established pursuant to that agreement. In addition, I shall order Respondent to reimburse, with interest, all present and former employees for all initiation fees, dues, and other moneys which may have been exacted from them by, or in behalf of, Local 486. The latter requirement is a remedial rather than a punitive measure, since it serves simply to restore to Respondent's driver employees sums involuntarily withheld pursuant to the checkoff provision in a collective-bargaining agreement here shown to have been unlawfully executed and maintained. Vernitron Electrical Components, Inc., Beau Products Division, 221 NLRB 464 (1975), enfd. 548 F.2d 24 (1st Cir. 1977).

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and upon the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[2]

The Respondent, Special Service Delivery, Inc., Highland, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Assisting or contributing support to Local 486 by recognizing or bargaining with such labor orgnization as the exclusive representative of its employees for the purpose of collective bargaining unless and until Local 486 is certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative of said employees pursuant to Section 9(c) of the Act.

(b) Maintaining or giving any force and effect to the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and Local 486 dated April 8, 1980, or any extension or modification thereof; provided, however, that nothing in this Order shall authorize or require the withdrawal or elimination of any wage increase or other benefits, terms, and conditions of employment which may have been established pursuant to the performance of said contract.

[1] Respondent cites Coppus Engineering Corporation v. N.L.R.B., 240 F.2d 564 (1st Cir. 1957), for the proposition that hasty recognition does not necessarily indicate domination of a union by an employer. Here, however, the issue is more fundamental than a question of employer domination since Respondent had no employees at the time it accorded exclusive recognition to Local 486.

[2] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(c) Withholding from the pay of any of its employees union dues or other union fees or assessments which have been deducted because of any obligation of membership in Local 486, and paying to Local 486 any dues, fees, or assessments which have been deducted from the pay of its employees.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act:

(a) Withdraw and withhold all recognition from Local 486 as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees unless and until said labor organization has been duly certified by the National Labor Relations Board as the exclusive representative of such employees.

(b) Reimburse all former and present employees for all initiation fees, dues, assessments, and other moneys, if any, paid by or withheld from them in the manner provided in "The Remedy" section of this Decision.

(c) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Highland, Michigan, facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 7, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and shall be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to its employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director for Region 7, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps it has taken to comply herewith.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

PETER E. DONNELLY, Administrative Law Judge: The charge herein was filed on October 15, 1979, by Retail Clerks Union, Local 1460, Chartered by United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, herein called Charging Party or Union. A complaint thereon was issued on April 24, 1980, alleging that East Chicago Rehabilitation Center, Inc., herein called Employer or Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by suspending and discharging 17 employees for engaging in an economic strike.[1] An answer thereto was

[1] The General Counsel's motion to strike the Respondent's responding brief is denied as lacking in merit.

[2] The Respondent contends that the strike caused disruptions in patient care and the employees therefore sacrificed the protection of the Act. We disagree. The walkout involved fewer than half of the day-shift employees, with the remaining employees and supervisors working as scheduled. The strike lasted only 2 hours. Although some patient care schedules were not completely adhered to, there is no showing that the strike jeopardized any patient's safety or health. We find the employees did not lose the protections afforded health care employees under the Act. Further, once the strikers offered to return to work they could not be held responsible for any subsequent interruption in normal patient servicing. In particular, the strikers cannot be held accountable for the Respondent's refusal to take them back, nor for the cutback in physical therapy for 3 days. Anything that occurred after the employees offered to return was the Respondent's sole responsibility and is irrelevant to the strike.

In accordance with his partial dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth in that opinion.

[3] The Respondent requested an opportunity to argue its case orally before the Board. In our opinion the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately set forth the issues and positions of the parties. Accordingly, we deny the Respondent's request for oral argument.

[1] The complaint was amended at the hearing to allege the status of Metta Stone as a supervisor.

259 NLRB No. 135

timely filed by Respondent and pursuant to notice, a hearing was held before me in Chicago, Illinois, on October 22 and 23, December 8, 9, and 17, 1980. Briefs have been timely filed by General Counsel and Respondent, which had been duly considered.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE EMPLOYER'S BUSINESS

The Employer is an Illinois corporation with a place of business located in East Chicago, Illinois, where it is engaged in the business of providing extended nursing care. During the past calendar year, Respondent, during the course and conduct of its operations, derived gross revenues in excess of $100,000, and also purchased and received goods valued in excess of $5,000 directly from points outside the State of Illinois. The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Employer is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

While the status of the Union as a labor organization is not specifically alleged, it is undisputed that the Union, the recently certified collective-bargaining representative of the employees, is acting in that capacity, and has negotiated a contract on behalf of the unit employees. Accordingly, I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

The Employer is a 24-hour skilled nursing care facility employing about 100 employees and serving about 116 patients. After a Board-conducted election, the Union was certified on December 11, 1978, as the collective-bargaining representative for a unit of service and maintenance employees.

Thereafter, a series of some 12 negotiating sessions took place in an effort to achieve a collective-bargaining agreement. The Union was represented at all of these bargaining sessions by Union Business Agents Wallace Evans and Arthur Primm. In addition, there was a three-member employee negotiating committee with two alternate members. Pursuant to an understanding with the business agents, the negotiating committee members did not participate directly in the negotiations but communicated with the business agents who actually conducted the negotiations. While all of the negotiating committee members except Jurline Woods attended at least some of the negotiating sessions, none of them attended the last three sessions conducted on May 23, June 11, 18, 1979.[2] Respondent was represented at all the negotiating sessions by Dr. Jerry Henderson, part owner of the facility and member, along with five others, of the facility's board of directors, and Steven Sanders, the administrator of the facility. Sanders, however, was not present at all times during all sessions due to other matters requiring his attention from time to time. During earlier sessions, a management consultant named Renee Stein participated on behalf of Respondent. Beginning with the May 23 session, another consultant named Dominic Licata represented Respondent.

Respondent sought a contract provision providing some overlap in shift hours in order to exchange information and smooth the transition between shifts. At the June 11 session, while discussing the shift lengthening proposal, other proposals were made by the Union, including certain proposals with a view towards extending the lunch period from one-half hour to 1 hour, with two 15-minute breaks. During this discussion it appears that Licata learned for the first time that employees of the facility were being permitted to leave the premises during the one-half hour paid lunch then in effect. Licata advised Henderson that Respondent was liable under workmen's compensation regulations for accidents to employees during this lunch period even while off Respondent's premises, because the one-half hour lunch was paid time. Licata also told Henderson that something would have to be done about the problem. Upon being so advised, Henderson, apparently accepting this advice as accurate, expressed the view to both Evans and Primm that the practice would have to be stopped and that it was his intention to bring the matter to the attention of Respondent's board of directors for resolution. The Union, for its part, conceded that the liability of Respondent existed, but both Evans and Primm cautioned Henderson that any precipitous corrective action at this time would be unwise, particularly since they were close to an agreement on a contract.[3]

As he had indicated at the June 11 session, Henderson did bring the matter to the attention of the board of directors on June 13. At this time, a decision was made to divest the facility of the presumed liability by ending the practice of employees being permitted to leave the premises during the one-half hour lunchbreak. Henderson then directed Sanders to prepare a memo to the employees so advising them. Sanders prepared the following memo dated Friday, June 15, 1979:

> May I take this opportunity to communicate and share with you one of the many concerns encountered by the Rehab.
> The East Chicago Rehabilitation Center currently engages the services of over eighty employees, all of whom enjoy a list of benefits; the expenses of which, are borne primarily by the facility.
>
> Please Note:
> Breaks and meal periods are fringe benefits paid solely and exclusively by our employers.

[2] All dates refer to 1979, unless otherwise indicated.

[3] Respondent contends that the evidence shows that the Union's representatives agreed to the elimination of the one-half hour paid lunch on June 11, citing primarily the testimony of Henderson. However, my review of the testimony of all the participants at the June 11 session convinces me that Henderson's account of the June 11 session is confused and often contradictory, and I am persuaded that the Union did not agree to the elimination of the paid one-half hour lunch period.

> Because of this fact, the Rehab is liable and accountable for you under Workmen's Compensation during these periods.
> It has been the PRACTICE of the Center to allow employees to leave the facility during meal periods and break periods.
>
> This is both ill advisable and unfortunate.
>
> If any employee is injured while out of the facility on company time (break, lunch, etc.) the employer is liable for that employee and may be subject to unnecessary legal action.
>
> As you can see, this places Rehab on unsteady ground.
>
> In a serious attempt to avoid involvement in needless litigation, it will be needful to implement the following Policy:
>
> Effective June 18, 1979 it will be NECESSARY and MANDATORY that all employees enjoy their lunch and break periods on the PREMISES of East Chicago Rehabilitation Center.
>
> Failure to comply with this policy will result in Immediate Termination.
> Please recognize, we are aware and mindful of your needs as an employee and are presently researching the possibility of a Food Service which will be accessible to all personnel during all shifts. However, until then, may I present to you a list of restaurants that provide delivery service.

The above memo was distributed to the employees at the facility, with their paychecks, beginning about 7 a.m. on Friday, June 15.[4] Many of the employees were disturbed by the memo and feeling thus aggrieved, met with Metta Stone, nursing supervisor. Apparently not assuaged, some 10 to 20 employees thereafter went to the office of Sanders, who met with them about 8:15 a.m. in the dining room, along with several other late arrivals for a total of between 30 to 40 employees. Sanders explained the matter of the facilities off premises lunch liability, but stated that he would try to have the change delayed. Still dissatisfied, a number of the employees punched out and left the premises, causing substantial disruption in the normal operations of the facility and creating serious patient care problems.

About 10 a.m., employee Rebecca Brown called Primm and told him that the employees were walking out. She told him about the paychecks and memo. Primm asked her to try and hold the people from walking out and to ask them to please wait until he got there. Brown told Primm that she was trying to stop them. Primm told her that he would be over right away and he arrived about 10:15 a.m. Several employees outside the facility were asked by Primm to go inside with him. Once inside, Primm met with Henderson and asked for permission to use the conference room to talk to the 10 employees, and Henderson agreed.

The meeting took place, attended by some 23 to 26 employees. Evans, having been contacted at Primm's request by the union secretary, arrived about 10 minutes after the meeting began with some three or four more 15 employees that Evans had met outside the facility and brought in with him. The employees complained about the memo and not being able to leave the premises for lunch. Primm explained the matter of Respondent's liability and told them that the Union was attempting to work out the problem in contract negotiations. Both Evans and Primm explained that it was not proper to leave the facility and that there were Federal laws which governed the matter. Evans and Primm told them that the Union did not condone or approve of the walkout and asked if they would be willing to go back to work. The employees agreed to return to work at which point Evans and Primm went to seek out Henderson.

About 10:30 a.m., they located Henderson and Sanders in Sanders' office. Evans told Henderson that the Union had not called the strike, did not condone the strike, and did not agree with the strike. He expressed surprise that the lunch hour change had already been announced and that they had hoped that it would not have been done because it was going to make a contract hard to sell. Henderson said that the board of directors wanted to stop the practice and that the change had to be made. Evans told Henderson that the people were ready to return to work and that the Union would appreciate their being put back to work. Henderson responded that the situation was very serious and that he would have to consult with the board of directors in deciding what action to take as to the 17 employees who had participated in the walkout. Henderson told Evans that the employees were to go home for the day and that they were being suspended subject to a determination by the board of directors as to their terminations. The meeting ended and the employees left the premises. On the evening of June 15, Sanders sent mailagrams to the 17 striking employees advising them that they were being suspended indefinitely pending a review by the board of directors.

The board of directors met on Wednesday, June 20, and decided that discharge was the appropriate discipline for having engaged in the walkout and leaving patients unattended on June 15. On the same date, June 20, mailagrams from Sanders were sent to the employees advising them of their terminations, "for the reasons that on June 15, 1979 you walked off your job and left the building and otherwise abandoned your employment without just cause and in violation of applicable laws."

[4] It is undisputed that the Union was not advised or consulted concerning this decision.

On June 18, the parties met in another negotiating session. The Union again solicitated Henderson to try to get the employees returned to work. This effort was not successful. However, the parties were successful in reaching agreement on the terms of a contract which became effective on June 28, 1979. This contract included provisions for a one-half hour unpaid lunch, two 20-minute paid lunchbreaks, and a shift overlap of 30 minutes.

B. Discussion and Analysis

The facts of this case raise the basic issue of whether the employees who participated in the walkout on June 15 were engaged in protected concerted activity. Respondent contends that they were not, on various grounds. First, Respondent contends that the failure to give written notice, as required under the provisions of Section 8(g) of the Act,[5] had the effect of depriving the walkout of any status as protected activity that it might have otherwise enjoyed. I do not agree.

In reviewing the facts of the instant case, it is clear that the basic problem giving rise to the walkout, i.e., the prohibition against employees leaving the premises during lunchtime, was not raised until the bargaining session of June 11 when it was raised by Licata.

At this session, the Union did not agree with Respondent to any change in Respondent's lunchtime practice which had permitted employees to leave the premises. All that the Union did was to express the view, in agreement with Respondent, that Respondent liability existed.[6] It was Respondent's board of directors who took the unilateral action of prohibiting employees from leaving the work premises during lunchtime.[7] As noted above, this was done by written notice with the paychecks of the employees on Friday, June 15, to become effective on Monday, June 18. This change was made without notice to the Union who had in fact cautioned against precipitous action being taken by Respondent at the June 11 meeting.

Upon being notified on June 15 of the change, the employees became agitated and disgruntled. After receiving no satisfactory response in meetings with Respondent, 17 employees walked out in protest.

There is no evidence that the Union had any prior notice of the walkout. Clearly, the Union was taken by surprise by the events of the morning of June 15. The Union was not aware that the strike had begun until it was so advised by an employee after the walkout had occurred. Thereafter, both Evans and Primm went to Respondent's facility, met with the employees, told them that they were wrong in striking, that the Union did not condone the strike, and exacted from the employees an agreement to return to work.

Thereafter, Evans and Primm met with Henderson and Sanders, told them that the Union did not condone the strike, and asked Respondent to allow the striking employees to return to work. This request was rejected by Respondent and the employees were suspended and subsequently discharged.

It is clear that the Union did all that it could after learning of the walkout to end it. Within about 2 hours, it had an agreement from the striking employees to return to work. Since Respondent rejected this, any deleterious effect that the strike may have had thereafter was assignable to Respondent, not the Union.

In these circumstances, it would not have been possible for the Union to have given the 8(g) notice contemplated by the Act since it had no prior notice of the walkout. Accordingly, I find that the Union's failure to provide such notice did not deprive the walkout of its protective character. Nor did the failure of the employees to provide 8(g) notice, render the walkout unprotected. The notice requirements of Section 8(g) run to the Unions, not employees, and the failure of employees to give such notice prior to striking a health care institution does not deprive the strike of its normally protected character. Walker Methodist Residence and Health Care Center, Inc., 227 NLRB 1630 (1977); Montefiore Hospital and Medical Center, 243 NLRB 681 (1979), enfd. 621 F.2d 510 (2d Cir. 1980); Villa Care, Inc., d/b/a Edmonds Villa Care Center, 249 NLRB 705 (1980).

However, Respondent also contends that the action of the employees in striking was in derogation of their collective-bargaining representative, and that therefore the striking employees are not entitled to the protection of the Act.

An examination of the facts herein discloses that after its certification on December 11, 1978, the Union and Respondent engaged in negotiations for a first contract. On June 11, the matter of Respondent's liability for employees leaving the premises on paid lunchtime was raised for the first time. No employees attended this negotiating session and there is nothing in the record to indicate that any of them were even aware that the subject was under discussion, and the Union did not agree to any change in the existing policy. Obviously, the Union and the employees were not taking inconsistent positions on this issue, and it was in this posture that the matter was brought to the attention of the employees on Friday, June 15, when they were notified of the change in policy becoming effective on the following Monday.[8]

On these facts, Respondent's "derogation" argument cannot be sustained. First, the position taken by the

[5] Sec. 8(g) of the Act reads:

> (g) A labor organization before engaging in any strike, picketing, or other concerted refusal to work at any health care institution shall, not less than ten days prior to such action, notify the institution in writing and the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service of that intention, except that in the case of bargaining for an initial agreement following certification or recognition the notice required by this subsection shall not be given until the expiration of the period specified in clause (B) of the last sentence of section 8(d) of this Act. The notice shall state the date and time that such action will commence. The notice, once given, may be extended by the written agreement of both parties.

[6] Whether such liability actually existed, as a matter of law, was never established.

[7] For whatever reason, no 8(a)(5) violation was alleged as to this unilateral change, and no finding of a violation is made herein.

[8] While there may have been other matters causing discontent among the employees, which were expressed by them in meetings on June 15, it is clear that Respondent's action which precipitated the walkout was the newly announced ban on leaving the premises at lunchtime.

Union at the June 11 negotiating session was not inconsistent with the position expressed by the employees by walking out. The Union and Respondent had not negotiated any agreement to end the practice.[9] It was a unilateral change undertaken by Respondent, and it was essentially to protest this unilateral change that the employees took the strike action. Moreover, on a basis of this record, it does not appear that the employees who struck were even aware that the matter had been raised for discussion at the June 11 meeting. These facts do not describe any "derogation" theory so as to strip the employees of their status as economic strikers.

Nor, on the facts of this case can the walkout by the employees be construed as an effort on the part of the striking employees to seek separate bargaining with Respondent despite the existence of their collective-bargaining representative. The walkout was simply a spontaneous reaction to Respondent's unilateral action in changing a term of their employment, without prior notice or consultation with either the employees or their collective-bargaining representative. As noted earlier, the striking employees were not even aware that the basic issue that they were protesting had even been raised in collective bargaining. Certainly such employee activity cannot be construed as an effort to seek separate bargaining. And, so, is obviously factually distinguished from the governing principle set forth in Emporium Capwell Co. v. Western Addition Community Organization, et al., 420 U.S. 50 (1975).

Respondent also makes the argument that, apart from notice requirements of Section 8(g), striking employees should not be entitled to the protection of the Act inasmuch as their actions resulted in patient neglect, and as a matter of public policy is repugnant to the Act. However, apart from the restrictions imposed upon unions by the requirements of Section 8(g) of the Act, there is nothing in the Act which imposes greater restrictions on the activities of employees in the health care industry than employees of any other industry subject to the jurisdiction of the Act. Montefiore Hospital and Medical Center, supra.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent as set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with Respondent's operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. I have found that Respondent suspended and discharged employees for reasons which offended the provisions of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. I shall therefore recommend that Respondent make them whole for any loss of pay which they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against them. The backpay provided herein with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[10]

[9] One could argue that since the Union conceded Respondent's liability, it would have been sympathetic to any change in the practice, but this is speculation in which I am not disposed to indulge, and is not tantamount to agreeing to the change in practice.

DECISION AND DIRECTION

By Chairman Van de Water and Members Jenkins and Hunter

Pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election approved by the Acting Regional Director for Region 19 on January 20, 1981, an election by secret ballot was conducted in the above-entitled matter on April 16, 1981, among the employees in the following appropriate collective-bargaining unit:

> All production and maintenance employees (including employees engaged in an economic strike which commenced less than 12 months before the election date and who retained their status as such during the eligibility period and their replacements) employed at 4601 S. Orchard, Tacoma, Washington; excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The tally of ballots showed that, of approximately 94 eligible voters, 23 cast ballots for and 38 cast ballots against the Union. There were 33 challenged ballots which were sufficient to affect the results of the election.

On May 1, 1981, following an investigation, the Acting Regional Director issued a Report on Challenged Ballots and Direction and Notice of Hearing.

Pursuant to the notice, a hearing on challenged ballots was held in Tacoma, Washington, on May 12, 13, 26, and 27 and June 4, 8, 10, and 11, 1981, before Hearing Officer Catherine M. Roth, in which the Employer and the Union participated. The parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce evidence bearing on the issues herein.

On July 31, 1981, the Hearing Officer issued her report in which she concluded that the challenges to 27 ballots should be overruled and the challenges to 6 ballots should be sustained.[1] She recommended that the overruled challenged ballots be opened and counted and a revised tally of ballots issued. Thereafter, the Employer filed timely exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Union filed an answering brief to the Employer's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the Hearing Officer's rulings made at the hearing and finds that they are free from prejudicial error. They are hereby affirmed.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions [2] and briefs and hereby adopts the Hearing Officer's findings and recommendations,[3] as modified herein.[4]

We agree with the Hearing Officer's recommendation to overrule the challenges to 27 ballots, and to sustain the challenges to 4 ballots. However, for the following reasons, we disagree with her recommendations that the challenges to the ballots of Roland Prouty and Robin Urich be sustained.

1. The Hearing Officer concluded that, as of the date of the election, Prouty was a temporary employee and thus ineligible to vote. She found that

---

[1] Specifically she recommended that challenges to the ballots of the following voters be overruled: Raymond R. Bame, Edward Combs, Richard L. Crocenzi, David C. Ell, Duane M. Felix, Robert W. Halsey, Douglas Hite, Mark D. Hite, Ralph Johnson, Joseph H. Kistler, Chris A. Markum, John H. McVey, Russell Morrison, Aaron Olson, Horace Olson, Gary Lee Parkos, Stuart J. Schreiner, John E. Sears, Mario S. Serka, Allen H. Stevens, Floyd Thompson, Timothy B. Wegner, Ken Wolever, Ted Wilson, Robert Creger, Leroy Henke, and Ron Owens. She recommended that challenges to the ballots of the following voters be sustained: Brian Cameron, Walter Davis, Eric Rehwaldt, Roland Prouty, Robin Urich, and James L. Sullens.

[2] In the absence of exceptions thereto, we adopt, pro forma, the recommendation of the Hearing Officer to sustain the challenges to the ballots of Brian Cameron, Walter Davis, Eric Rehwaldt, and James L. Sullens, and to overrule the challenges to the ballots of Robert Creger, Leroy Henke, and Ron Owens.

In its brief in support of its exceptions to the Hearing Officer's report and recommendations, the Employer noted that, during the hearing, the Employer withdrew its challenge to the ballot of Edward Combs and, in its brief to the Hearing Officer, it withdrew its challenges to the ballots of David C. Ell, Robert W. Halsey, Ralph Johnson, Chris A. Markum, Russell Morrison, Horace Olson, and Allan H. Stevens. The above-named voters were all employed at Tacoma Boat at the time of the hearing. However, elsewhere in this brief, the Employer excepted to the Hearing Officer's recommendations to overrule the challenges to the ballots of these voters. Additionally, in its motion to reopen the record, the Employer requested that it be permitted to revoke its withdrawal of its challenge to Ell's ballot. We find that, even if the Employer intended to preserve its challenges to the ballots of these voters, the challenges should be overruled for the reasons stated by the Hearing Officer in her analysis with respect to the other strikers who subsequently were employed at Tacoma Boat.

[3] The Employer has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Hearing Officer. It is the established policy of the Board not to overrule a Hearing Officer's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. The Coca-Cola Bottling Company of Memphis, 132 NLRB 481, 483 (1961); Stretch-Tex Co., 118 NLRB 1359, 1361 (1957). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing her findings.

[4] On August 24, 1981, the Employer filed with the Board a motion to reopen the record. The Union opposed the motion. the Employer seeks to introduce evidence that, during July and August 1981, the Employer offered reinstatement to several former strikers and that these offers were refused. However, the voting eligibility of these individuals hinges upon whether they had abandoned employment with the Employer as of the election date. See Pacific Tile and Porcelain Company, 137 NLRB 1358 (1962). The Employer's allegations involve post-election conduct and, even if true, are not relevant to our determination. Accordingly, we deny the Employer's motion.

Prouty was on layoff status with his former employer, Southwest Deliveries, and that he maintained a home in Vancouver, Washington, 135 miles from the Employer's facilities.[5] She further found that, at a February 28, 1981, union meeting, Prouty told two union business agents that he was employed at Town Concrete Pipe on a temporary basis. The Hearing Officer concluded that Prouty intended to stay at his job with the Employer only until he was recalled by Southwest Deliveries.

The Employer excepts to this conclusion, contending that Prouty was hired as a permanent employee, and remained as such at the time of the election. We believe that the weight of the record evidence supports the Employer's contention.

Orville McKenzie, a mechanic with the Employer who became incapacitated by a back ailment, recommended Prouty as his replacement. Pursuant to this recommendation, Plant Superintendent Dan Columbini hired Prouty on November 25, 1980. Both Columbini and Prouty testified that there was no mention at the hiring interview that the job would be temporary. Columbini stated, "[I]t was understood when he was hired that he was a full-time employee."[6]

Prouty had been laid off at Southwest Deliveries due to a lack of available work on February 5, 1980, more than 9 months before he commenced employment with the Employer. James Barnes, the general manager of Southwest Deliveries, testified that Prouty was technically eligible for recall for 3 years after being laid off. However, he also stated that Prouty's reemployment was extremely unlikely, and that Prouty was never given any indication that he would be recalled.[7] Under these circumstances, we find that while Prouty was working for the Employer he did not have a reasonable expectation of returning to Southwest Deliveries.

We do not attribute considerable significance to Prouty's statement at the union meeting that he was only a temporary employee. Prouty may have hoped that he would soon obtain a job at Southwest Deliveries or elsewhere, but there is no evidence that he reasonably expected to leave at anytime soon.

Considering all of the relevant evidence, we find that the Petitioner has not demonstrated that Prouty was a temporary employee. Accordingly, we overrule the challenge to his ballot.

2. Urich resigned his position as a machine operator with the Employer on April 7, 1981, 9 days before the election. Company Vice President Raymond Davis telephoned him the following day to ask why he quit, and Urich replied that he did not like his supervisor and disapproved of the way the plant was run.[8] On April 9, Urich met with Davis and Columbini at the company offices and admitted that he actually quit because he had severe problems with drugs and alcohol, and he believed that he was "falling apart." Upon his assurance that he would seek professional help for his problems, the Employer changed Urich's status from voluntary quit and granted him a medical leave of absence. Urich remained out of work until April 20, 1981.

The Hearing Officer found that Urich was not a bona fide employee at the time of the election, but was rehired by the Employer in an effort to "flood" the unit with antiunion employees. She emphasized that Urich was an outspoken opponent of the Union's organizing drive and served as a company observer at the election. The Hearing Officer also indicated that Urich had received disciplinary warnings from the Employer, and observed that another employee who had also quit was not asked to return because he had disciplinary problems. In addition, the Hearing Officer found that Urich was rehired although he did not get professional help as he had promised.

We disagree with the Hearing Officer and find that Urich was an eligible voter. Urich had been employed by the Employer since July 1977. Although he received several warnings for absenteeism,[9] he was not considered to be a serious disciplinary problem, and there is no evidence that he was not a competent employee.

Additionally, we find that the Employer's treatment of Urich was consistent with its past practice. The record indicates that, during the past few years, the Employer contacted several other employees who had quit and asked them to return. With respect to the individual referred to by the Hearing Officer who was not requested to return, Columbini testified that his disciplinary problems were such that the company management was of the opinion that he was "not salvageable."

Urich testified that, during the week that he was on leave, he applied to enter a free clinic but was not accepted. He told Columbini that he intended to seek private counseling, but he needed to work in order to pay for it. He also stated that he had not had any drugs or alcohol for a week. Columbini believed that Urich was making a serious effort to obtain professional help to get well and therefore permitted him to return to work.

[5] Prouty commuted to Vancouver each weekend.

[6] The record indicates that Columbini granted Prouty's request for a 2-week probationary period, after which he would be paid at his full salary. The Employer generally required a 90-day probationary period.

[7] The Hearing Officer fully credited Barnes' testimony.

[8] Davis testified that it is his policy to speak to employees who quit and to ascertain the reasons why.

[9] His unexplained absences apparently resulted from his problems with alcohol.

We note that the Employer granted medical leave from December 24, 1980, until March 2, 1981, to another employee whose ballot was challenged because he was hospitalized due to severe psychological problems. In recommending that we overrule the challenge to that ballot,[10] the Hearing Officer stated, inter alia, that "there is a presumption that an employee granted a leave of absence is still an employee." She further indicated that "[t]he only evidence presented by the Union to show that the Employer was packing the unit was the placement of two employees on medical leave and the Employer's alleged failure to give special consideration to a union adherent."[11] We find that these considerations support our conclusion that the Employer granted medical leave to and rehired Urich for legitimate reasons.

The evidence herein does not demonstrate that the Employer rehired Urich as part of a scheme to pack the unit. In contrast to the Hearing Officer, we do not find it extraordinary that the Employer contacted a longstanding employee such as Urich to find out why he quit, and offered him an opportunity to return to work. Accordingly, we overrule the challenge to his ballot.

DIRECTION

The Regional Director is hereby directed to open and count the ballots of Raymond R. Bame, Edward Combs, Richard L. Crocenzi, David C. Ell, Duane M. Felix, Robert W. Halsey, Douglas Hite, Mark D. Hite, Ralph Johnson, Joseph H. Kistler, Chris A. Markum, John H. McVey, Russell Morrison, Aaron Olson, Horace Olson, Gary Lee Parkos, Stuart J. Schreiner, John E. Sears, Mario S. Serka, Allen H. Stevens, Floyd Thompson, Timothy B. Wegner, Ken Wolever, Ted Wilson, Robert Creger, Leroy Henke, Ron Owens, Roland Prouty, and Robin Urich, and thereafter prepare and cause to be served on the parties a revised tally of ballots. Thereafter, the Regional Director shall issue the appropriate certification.

[10] There was no exception to this recommendation and we adopted it, pro forma, in fn. 2, supra.

On August 12, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Robert A. Giannasi issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, counsel for the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the Charging Party filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions, cross-exceptions, and briefs, and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.[2]

DELTA HOSIERY, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT A. GIANNASI, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard on March 3, 4, and 5, 1981, in Wilkes Barre, Pennsylvania. The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threats and interrogations made by agents of Respondent and violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by laying off one employee for 4 days, by refusing to hire an employee and by "constructively" discharging another for discriminatory reasons. The complaint also alleges that the Charging Party (hereafter the Union) had obtained signed authorization cards from a majority of Respondent's employees and that, because of its unfair labor practices, Respondent's refusal to bargain with the Union violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act and required a bargaining order remedy. Respondent denied the essential allegations of the complaint. All parties filed briefs which were received on or about June 1, 1981.

Upon the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I hereby make the following:

---

[1] Respondent, Charging Party, and General Counsel have excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] Member Jenkins would compute interest in accordance with the formula set forth in his partial dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980).

259 NLRB No. 139

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent, a New York corporation, is engaged in the packaging of hosiery at its facility located at 100 S. Pennsylvania Boulevard, Wilkes Barre, Pennsylvania. During a representative 1-year period, Respondent had gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and purchased goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. Accordingly, I find, as Respondent admits, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent employs some 53 employees, most of whom fold and package hosiery which is manufactured elsewhere and sent to Wilkes Barre for packaging. During the winter, Respondent's facility operates between 8 a.m. and 6 p.m., Monday through Friday, and 8 a.m. to 3 p.m. on Saturday. During the summer, it operates between 8 a.m. and 4:30 p.m., Monday through Friday, with no work on Saturday. In addition to regular full-time employees, Respondent employs high school students who work part-time on the so-called night shift during the school year, that is, 3 p.m. to 6 p.m. on weekdays and a full day on Saturday. At all material times until his death in the autumn of 1980, the plant manager in charge of the Wilkes Barre facility was Jim Murdock. Until Jim Murdock's death, his son, George, was a supervisor in charge of the shipping and receiving department. George Murdock became plant supervisor upon his father's death. In addition, Respondent's work force included two senior employees, Helen Javick and Mary Goff, who were identified as floor ladies. The floor ladies basically separated stock when it arrived at the facility and distributed it to other employees for folding and packaging. Most, but not all, of the folding and packaging was performed upstairs on the second floor. The material arrived on the first floor where it was separated and placed on a conveyer leading to the second floor. The floor ladies and Murdock had desks on the first floor of the facility. Respondent has no job classifications because all jobs are interchangeable, except perhaps that of Carol Gross, an employee who operates a printing machine on the first floor.

The General Counsel does not allege that floor ladies Mary Goff and Helen Javick were supervisors of Respondent within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. He entered into a stipulation with Respondent that they were included in the bargaining unit of 53 employees. He nevertheless alleged in his complaint that Goff and Javick were agents of Respondent and that Respondent was liable for certain statements made by them to employees. The evidence shows that the floor ladies transmitted orders, warnings, and complaints about low production from Jim Murdock to other employees, distributed work to them and instructed new employees on how to do their jobs. They also occasionally sent people home if there was no work and handled sick leave requests, although it is not clear that they had independent judgment in these matters. They certainly did not responsibly direct employees within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

The evidence reveals that Jim Murdock supervised Respondent's operation very closely and the employees were well aware of his close supervision. For example, Desiree Evans testified at length about his expressed concern over her production and her absenteeism. She also testified that he gave her permission to take time off because of vacation and illness. Jim Murdock also warned other employees about their production and moved employees because they were "talking." Thus, while it appears that for some, but not all, purposes Goff and Javick were agents of Respondent, they were not supervisors and utilized little, if any, independent judgment in carrying out their functions.

B. The Union Campaign

After some initial contacts from employees, the Union arranged for a meeting of Respondent's employees on May 20, 1980, at a Wilkes Barre hotel. Fifteen employees attended. A union representative, Ted Gatto, passed out an information leaflet to employees and explained their rights under the Labor Act. He then distributed union authorization cards and read aloud the content of the cards. All 15 employees signed the cards. At the meeting, the employees elected an organization committee composed of employees Louise Groner, Jeanne Strausser, Cindy Walkowiak, Desiree Evans, Sharon Ridinger, and Suzanne Evans.

By May 22, about 30 employees had signed cards. At least eight of these cards were secured through the solicitations of Louise Groner and Suzanne Evans. They talked to employees in the parking lot of Respondent's facility, at a Mr. Donut Shop nearby, and in a restroom inside the facility.

On May 28, the Union sent a mailgram to Respondent informing it that a majority of its employees had designated the Union as bargaining representative and requesting recognition and bargaining. This mailgram was received by Respondent the same day. Respondent never replied to the mailgram although it apparently did file an election petition with the Board which was dismissed because of the initiation of these proceedings.

C. The Alleged Misconduct of Goff and Javick

At about 2:30 p.m. on May 28, Mary Goff approached employees individually at their work stations and asked them what they thought about supporting a union. She carried a piece of paper with her which contained the employees' names on it and columns designating prounion or antiunion. She marked the paper after receiving responses from the employees. Goff gave no reason for the inquiries and no assurances against reprisals. When she finished her poll, Goff joined Jim Murdock and

Helen Javick who were standing at one end of the upstairs room in which the employees worked. Goff showed the paper to Murdock and they went downstairs together.[1]

Jeanne Strausser testified that when Mary Goff approached her and Cindy Walkowiak on the afternoon of May 28, in addition to inquiring about their union sympathies, she stated that "she did not want a union, and if there was any indication of a union, New York was going to close the plant." The testimony was uncontradicted since Mary Goff did not testify in this proceeding. Walkowiak did testify but was not questioned on this matter. I credit Strausser who testified in a clear and straightforward manner and survived vigorous cross-examination.

Employee Carol Gross testified that, on May 28, she told Mary Goff that she supported the Union. Goff also talked to her 1 or 2 days later. She asked whether Suzanne Evans or Louise Groner had approached her about the Union. Gross said it was Groner. Goff also said that she had determined that there were only seven employees who supported the Union and she asked Gross if she knew the names of the people who supported the Union. Gross said she did not, but stated she thought there were more than seven and that about 90 percent supported the Union. According to Gross, Goff said, "the big boss said if this union gets in, they're moving out." Gross was cross-examined thoroughly by counsel for Respondent but was not questioned about this conversation. Gross' testimony about Goff's remarks concerning the moving of the facility was in effect corroborated by Strausser who testified that Goff mentioned this subject to her on May 28. Although I found Gross unreliable in other parts of her testimony, her testimony about the Goff encounter was reliable and it was compatible with other testimony concerning Goff's approach to employees about the Union.

Employee Andrea Chvera testified that Helen Javick approached her at her work table on June 9 and asked her if "anyone had asked me about the union." She said no. Javick then asked if Louise Groner "didn't nab me yet." She said no. Javick then asked what she thought about the Union and Chvera said "I don't know." Javick also asked Chvera how her sister felt about a union and Chvera told Javick to ask her, which she did. Javick asked Patricia Chvera if she knew anything about the Union and Patricia said she did not. Javick then walked away. Employee Bonnie Zadora testified that Javick also asked her if anyone had approached her about the Union. She said no, and Javick asked if Zadora knew "what they were offering" and then she said "they hadn't approached her either."

The next day, according to the testimony of Zadora and Theresa Allabaugh, Javick approached a group of employees while they were on break. She asked if they knew what the Union was offering. The response was that the employees did not know. She asked whether they would all stick together and vote no and the employees said they would. Javick also said she did not know why anyone would want a union because the employees had paid vacations and holidays. She also said "if the Union got in, that we would have to start from scratch."

According to Suzanne Evans, on June 10, Javick saw her in the restroom and asked if she was "involved with the Union." Evans said yes. Javick asked if another employee was involved and Evans said she did not know. Javick then said, "why don't you go to Jim for a raise and I said, you know, I didn't know."[2]

The General Counsel alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by virtue of interrogations and threats by Mary Goff and interrogations by Helen Javick. As I have indicated, the General Counsel does not allege that Goff and Javick are supervisors. Indeed, he stipulated that they were properly members of the bargaining unit in this case. He does allege, however, that they were agents of Respondent and that Respondent was thus responsible for their conduct and statements which he further alleges were violative of the Act.

An employer may be liable for the acts of nonsupervisory employees who act as his agents. See International Association of Machinists, Tool and Die Makers Lodge No. 35 [Senick Corp.] v. N.L.R.B., 311 U.S. 72, 80–81 (1940). It is settled that where an employer places a nonsupervisory employee in a position in which employees could reasonably believe he speaks for management, the employer may be responsible for the coercive statements of that employee. Edgar L. Landen t/a Speed Mail Service, 251 NLRB 476–477 (1980). The critical issue is "whether under all the circumstances, the employees would reasonably believe that the non-supervisory employee was reflecting company policy and speaking and acting for management." Community Cash Stores, Inc., 238 NLRB 265 (1978). Another factor to be considered in determining employer responsibility in this case is that the two alleged agents, Mary Goff and Helen Javick, were stipulated to be unit employees and not alleged to be supervisors within the meaning of the Act. In analogous circumstances—where individuals are included in a bargaining unit or permitted to vote without challenge in a Board election and they are later found to be supervisors—the Board finds an employer responsible for the acts and statements of such supervisors only where the employer encourages, authorizes, or ratifies the supervisors' activities or "acted in such a manner as to lead employees reasonably to believe that the supervisor was acting for and on behalf of management." Hy Plains Dressed Beef, Inc., 146 NLRB 1253, 1254 (1964).

In applying the above principles, I find that Respondent is responsible for the conduct and statements of Mary Goff, but is not responsible for the conduct and statements of Helen Javick. In addition, I find that the alleged misconduct of Javick was not coercive within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Goff's polling of employees on May 28 was clearly viewed by employees as an act of management and management itself acquiesced in her conduct. Goff, who was certainly an agent for transmitting orders from Jim Murdock and for assigning work, made a systematic poll of employees about their union sentiments. Jim Murdock was present and visible to employees at least when Goff finished her poll because she brought the paper with the results of the poll to Murdock and they walked away together. Thus, because of the circumstances of the poll, Goff's general authority as a floor lady, and the presence of Jim Murdock, it is clear that Respondent, through Murdock, authorized—or apparently authorized—and ratified Goff's polling of employees. The poll itself was unlawful because Goff did not explain its purpose and did not give assurances against reprisals. Some of the employees gave obviously untruthful or evasive answers. The poll was thus coercive and violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In addition, Goff's inquiries of Carol Gross 1 or 2 days later about whether Groner or Suzanne Evans had approached her were also unlawful. Gross, who had been polled on May 28, obviously regarded Goff in the same light during the individual interrogation as she had in the earlier one because management had authorized or ratified Goff's role during the May 28 questioning. Thus, this interrogation was also coercive.

[1] The above is based on the uncontradicted and mutually corroborative testimony of several employees.

[2] The above was based on uncontradicted testimony since Javick was not called as a witness.

The General Counsel also alleges as unlawful Goff's remarks to Strausser on May 28 and to Gross 1 or 2 days later to the effect that Respondent would close or move the plant. Although, at first blush, it might appear that Goff would not be privy to such management decisions in her limited capacity as a floor lady, the fact that Respondent authorized and ratified Goff's role in polling employees imbued her, in the minds of employees, with special competence in reflecting the views of management on the union effort. This is particularly so with respect to the remark to Strausser because it was made during the May 28 poll. The remark to Gross was made 1 or 2 days later also during an interrogation. When Goff spoke about unions, employees listened. No explanatory business reasons or reasons beyond the control of the employer were given for the economic holocaust which would eventuate if the employees selected a union. Thus, Goff's remarks about the closing or moving of the facility were coercive and violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

In contrast, I do not believe that the employees who participated in the alleged unlawful conversations with Javick could reasonably believe that she spoke for management or was reflecting management policies. First of all, she, like Mary Goff, was not a supervisor and was stipulated to be an employee in the bargaining unit. She was therefore entitled to participate in discussions about the Union and to convince other employees or to be convinced by others when it came to support or rejection of the Union. Secondly, unlike Mary Goff, Javick was not intimately connected with a systematic poll of employees which was obviously ratified and authorized by Jim Murdock. Her inquiries and statements to employees took place some 2 weeks after Mary Goff's poll. Finally, the Javick inquiries themselves were not made in the context of coercing or in circumstances that would indicate that Javick was speaking for management. Rather she spoke as if she was a fellow employee sharing her views—albeit antiunion views—with others. Thus, she asked Andrea Chvera if Louise Groner, a union supporter, had "nabbed [her] yet" and she told Zadora that "they," meaning the union supporters, had not "approached her either." Her remarks to a group of employees on break are likewise innocuous. She simply asked what the Union was offering, asked whether they would stick together and vote no—apparently the election petition had been filed at this point—and gave her view as to why a union was not necessary. She also made the remark that if the Union came in "we would have to start from scratch." The General Counsel argues that this statement is coercive. I disagree. First of all, there was no suggestion on the part of Javick that existing benefits would be taken away by Respondent and that bargaining would begin from scratch. It is in this context that bargaining from scratch statements may be viewed as coercive. Without evidence from which such an inference could be made, the remark is ambiguous and noncoercive. Secondly, and more importantly, there is no evidence that Javick had any authority to rescind benefits or would have any voice in collective bargaining on Respondent's behalf. Nor would her relatively low status as an agent of Respondent for transmitting orders and assigning work create in the minds of employees the impression that she spoke with authority in these matters. In these circumstances, I consider Javick's remarks to have been her personal opinion as an employee and I believe they were regarded as such by other employees. Accordingly, I shall dismiss the allegation that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by virtue of Javick's questioning of employees.

D. The Alleged Misconduct of Jim and George Murdock

Employee Carol Gross testified that, on June 18, Jim Murdock approached her and said, "if this union gets in, that's going." He pointed to the printing machine Gross worked on, and said "if you can find another job, you better take it, because I don't want to see you get hurt by all this. And then he started to walk away and he turned around and said, I'm pretty sure have them beat by at least 15 votes, but you never can tell, so I just thought I would tell you." After counsel for Respondent tried unsuccessfully to impeach Gross' testimony by reference to her pretrial affidavit, Gross explained that she made the same statement in the affidavit that she did on the witness stand. Gross remained firm about Jim Murdock's remarks despite vigorous cross-examination. I credit Gross' testimony on this point and find that Jim Murdock's remarks amounted to a threat that there would be a loss of work if the Union won representation rights. This was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Carol Gross also testified that, at some indeterminate time "from October up until last month [February 1981]," George Murdock, who had taken over his father's job after the latter's death, accused the Union of having caused his father's death and said that he was going to "press charges against . . . the Union and everybody who pressed charges against Jim." He said that "when this was all over, he intended to swing a big axe and he didn't get mad, he got even." He also said that if there was anyone "looking for a job, they should come in to fill out applications because when this was over, there was going to be a lot of tables to be filled." According to Gross, there were three or four other employees present when these statements were made. However, none of these people corroborated Gross.

On cross-examination, Gross, for the first time, separated Murdock's remarks into two conversations. The first—the swinging the axe remark—she identified as having occurred "probably" in January 1981. She said the remark was made to all four employees who had been talking about the "people upstairs" who were identified as "weird." Murdock said he could not stand them, and, according to Gross, he mentioned swinging an axe in connection with the people upstairs who had been referred to as "weird." Gross testified that, in this conversation, the word "union" was not mentioned.

The second remark, according to Gross' testimony on cross-examination, was made in February 1981. Even on cross-examination, however, Gross was unable to specify dates. She also testified that, in these remarks—that people should fill out applications when "this was over" because there were "going to be a lot of tables to be filled"—the word "union" was not mentioned.

I do not credit Gross' testimony on the alleged George Murdock threats even though it was not contradicted. Gross' testimony on this aspect of the case—as it was on the Desiree Evans allegation discussed later in this Decision—was vague and unreliable. Gross was unable to pinpoint the dates or times of the alleged conversations. Her testimony on direct conflicted with her testimony on cross-examination. Moreover, she was not corroborated even though she identified three or four other employees who were allegedly present when George Murdock made his remarks. Significantly, Gross kept notes of other conversations about the Union she had with officials of Respondent but failed to do so with respect to the conversations with George Murdock. This might well explain her vague testimony on some issues in this case. Gross testified in such general terms about the context of the alleged George Murdock conversations and the date or dates of the conversations that I am unable to credit her testimony. In these circumstances, and because George Murdock was not accused of unfair labor practices by any other employee, I cannot credit Gross' uncorroborated testimony on this issue.

Employee Sharon Wojcik testified that, at about 2:20 p.m. on the afternoon of May 28, Jim Murdock approached her and asked her if she had signed a union card. She said she did not know anything about a union. She also testified that he said "That's okay because the big boss wouldn't go for it and he would close and move to Reading." She testified that she understood the "big boss" to mean one of the owners of Respondent from New York. Wojcik also testified that employees Ridinger and Desiree Evans were present during this conversation. However, neither of these employees—both of whom testified in this proceeding—corroborated Wojcik. Indeed, Evans testified that Murdock did not talk to her between May 28 and September 9 about the Union. Although Wojcik testified that Murdock talked to her and not Evans, it seems likely that if a threat to close the plant had been made in the presence of Evans she would have testified about it. Moreover, I find it highly unlikely that Murdock would have approached a group of three employees to question one of them 10 minutes before Mary Goff went around to poll employees in circumstances which clearly showed he wanted to insulate himself from the polling. Finally, I perceived in Wojcik a personal animosity towards Murdock because he frequently complained to her, through Helen Javick, about her low production, particularly in the summer of 1980 shortly before his death. In these circumstances, I do not credit the uncorroborated testimony of Wojcik and I shall dismiss any alleged violations based solely on her testimony.

E. The Failure To Hire Michele Evans[3]

Michele Evans, the sister of employee Desiree Evans, applied for work at Respondent's facility on Tuesday, May 27, 1980. She spoke to George Murdock. He told her he would call her some time that week. That day, Helen Javick talked to Desiree and told her that Michele had been hired and that she was to tell Michele to come to work on Thursday. That same day Jim Murdock approached Desiree. He asked whether Javick had talked to her about Michele and confirmed that Michele was hired. He told Desiree to tell Michele to report on Thursday.

Desiree also testified that Goff approached her on the afternoon of May 28. She testified as follows:

> Mary Goff, the floor lady had approached me and asked me if I knew anything about the Union and I told her no and then she asked me would I like to have a Union—like did I sign a union card and I asked her do I have to give you an honest answer and once again, she said would you like to have a union and I said, sure, why not.

A question mark was placed after Desiree's name on the poll. Desiree also testified that, a few minutes after Mary Goff and Jim Murdock went downstairs, they returned, and Jim Murdock approached her and "asked me if Michele was still coming in Thursday and I said yes. He told me to tell her not to come in and he said that there were other girls waiting ahead of her."[4]

The General Counsel alleges that Respondent's reversal of position and refusal to hire Michele Evans was based on her sister's possible union sympathy and was thus discriminatory. I agree. An employer's refusal to hire an applicant based on the union activity of a relative has been found to be violative of the Act. See Coper-Vulcan, Inc., 237 NLRB 1253, 1257 (1978), enfd. in pertinent part 611 F.2d, 440, 442 (3d Cir. 1979).

In the instant case, the uncontradicted evidence establishes a prima facie case of a violation. On May 27, Desiree Evans was told by Jim Murdock and by Helen

---

[3] The General Counsel submitted a motion to correct the transcript in certain respects, including an erroneous identification of Michele Evans as Cheryl Evans. The motion was unopposed. I hereby grant the motion and correct the transcript.

[4] The above reflects the transcript as corrected.

Javick that her sister, who had been interviewed that day for a job with Respondent, was hired and that she should report for work on Thursday. The next day, Respondent received the Union's demand for recognition and, through Mary Goff, polled employees concerning their support of the Union. When Goff approached Evans, Evans indicated to her that she might support the Union. A question mark appeared next to her name. Goff showed the results of her poll to Murdock and, shortly thereafter, Murdock told Evans that her sister should not report for work. The timing of Respondent's change of position makes it likely that the reason for failing to hire Michele, after Respondent indicated the day before that she had been hired, was her sister's possible support of the Union and Respondent's concern over the Union's professed majority status and request for recognition. Although the issue is a close one, I am constrained to find that Respondent either did not want another employee who, like her sister, might support the Union or wanted to exert some pressure on Desiree to reject the Union. The evidence was sufficient to require Respondent to rebut the natural inference of illegality which flowed from the facts presented by the General Counsel. Respondent submitted no evidence on this issue, even though George Murdock, who had interviewed Michele, did testify, and Helen Javick, who transmitted Jim Murdock's decision that Michele had been hired, and Mary Goff, who spoke to Murdock just before he told Desiree Evans that Michele should not report for work, were still employed by Respondent. In these circumstances, I find that Respondent's failure to hire Michele Evans after it had made a decision to hire her and have her report for work was discriminatorily motivated and violative of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

F. The Layoff of Colleen McGrady

The General Counsel alleges that Respondent unlawfully laid off employee Colleen McGrady from May 28 until June 2, 1980, because of her union activities. There is a paucity of evidence concerning McGrady's union activities or any animus directed to McGrady. McGrady, who was a high school student, worked from 3 to 6 p.m. on weekdays and from 8 to 3 on Saturdays. She had signed a union card on May 22. Other employees working part time along with her had signed cards and later changed their minds after talking with their parents. On May 27, McGrady overheard Helen Javick talking to an employee with whom McGrady had previously spoken about the Union. According to McGrady, Javick told that employee, "there is no way of stopping it, all they could do was wait and see what would happen." On May 28, the next day, Javick called McGrady's school and left a message for her not to come to work that day. This was the normal procedure by which Respondent got in touch with high school students who worked part time. McGrady called Javick that evening and Javick told her there was no work. On May 29, Javick tried to call McGrady at her school but she was absent. Javick also tried to call her at her home but she was not there. Two other part-time employees were hired on May 29 and McGrady apparently returned to work on June 2 after missing 4 days of work.

The evidence set forth above does not establish that McGrady was laid off for discriminatory reasons. McGrady was not a leader in the union effort. There is no evidence of union animus directed towards her or of Respondent's knnwledge that she had signed a union card. Any evidence based on the overheard conversation between Javick and another employee would be speculative since the conversation did not involve McGrady's union activities. Nor was McGrady questioned with the other employees on May 28. Two employees were hired on May 29, but this does not establish a discriminatory motive for not permitting McGrady to work on May 28. McGrady herself returned after missing only 4 days of work. She then broke her leg, and, after she recovered, returned to work once more. She then quit her employment. Respondent's benign treatment of McGrady after she returned to work in June belies any inference of wrongdoing in late May. At best, the evidence submitted by the General Counsel raises a suspicion that McGrady may have been laid off for a reason—lack of work—which was refuted by the hiring of two part-time employees. But this is not enough to sustain the General Counsel's burden of affirmatively proving a prima facie case of a violation by a preponderance of the evidence. For there is no evidence that the reason for McGrady's layoff was based on her union affiliation.

G. The Alleged Constructive Discharge of Desiree Evans

The General Counsel also alleges that Desiree Evans was transferred and harassed and eventually constructively discharged, that is, Respondent forced her to quit her employment on September 9, 1980, because of her union sympathies. The applicable legal principle may be stated as follows:

> There are two elements which must be proved to establish a "constructive discharge." First, the burdens imposed upon the employee must cause, and be intended to cause, a change in his working conditions so difficult or unpleasant as to force him to resign. Second, it must be shown that those burdens were imposed because of the employee's union activities. Crystal Princeton Refining Company, 222 NLRB 1068, 1069 (1967).

Desiree Evans began working for Respondent in February 1980 as a full-time folding employee. She signed a union card at the union meeting of May 20. She was elected to the six-person organizing committee and she spoke to two employees before May 28 about signing cards. Neither of these employees signed cards as a result of her solicitation. Desiree Evans was questioned along with other employees on May 28, and, although she gave a mildly affirmative response, a question mark appeared after her name on the polling sheet used by Mary Goff to assess the union sympathies of employees. According to Carol Gross, Jim Murdock identified three people as union supporters "Susan, Louise, Sharon and the rest he just referred to as the followers." I have also found that Desiree's sister, Michele, was not hired in late May for discriminatory reasons.

There is no evidence that any management representative spoke to Desiree Evans about the Union between late May and August 27, 1980, at which time Desiree was moved downstairs by Jim Murdock. She asked him why she was being moved, and he replied "there was work to be done downstairs."

Carol Gross testified that a "couple of days" before Evans was moved downstairs she overheard the following conversation:

> I was sitting at my machine. There's a small table by the machine and I was putting stickers and Jim came out of the office really fast and Helen was standing at a table down a little further and when he started up the aisle, he yelled, "That was Desiree on the phone" and Helen started walking towards Jim and Jim said, "She's saying that you told her I was going to hire her sister and I didn't hire her because of the Union and that's what she's telling the Labor Board." And Helen said, "She's a goddamn liar" and he said, "I thought so," he says, "I'm bringing her down here and I'm going to keep an eye on her."

Although Gross' testimony on this point was uncontradicted and undisturbed on cross-examination, its inherent reliability is suspect. For example, if, indeed, Desiree had called Jim Murdock and talked to him about the charge that her sister had been discriminated against, it would seem that Desiree would have testified about this conversation and established the date of the conversation. The timing of this alleged conversation vis-a-vis the transfer of Desiree would, after all, be crucial to the General Counsel's case. However, Desiree did not testify about any such conversation. Nor does it seem plausible that such a conversation occurred or that it occurred a "couple of days" before Desiree's transfer downstairs on August 27, as testified. The complaint alleging the refusal to hire Desiree's sister issued some 3 weeks before the transfer. Gross' testimony strikes me as a reflection of what Gross believed was the reason for the transfer of Desiree rather than an accurate reflection of the facts as she heard and observed them.

The General Counsel, in apparent recognition of the implausibility of Gross' testimony, states in his brief that it should be "interpreted as either that Murdock meant that the conversation was about Desiree or that he said the conversation was about Desiree and Gross misperceived his exact words." Findings cannot be based on such speculation. Obviously,if Gross misperceived what was said in one part of the conversation, she could have misperceived other parts of it. I have credited parts of Gross' testmony but I have not credited other parts of it. On this issue I do not find her testimony reliable.

Evans apparently worked downstairs on August 27, as well as Thursday and Friday of that week. The following Monday was Labor Day, a holiday. Desiree did not come into work on Tuesday and Wednesday, September 2 and 3.

On September 4, 1980, Jim Murdock wrote a letter to Desiree which was delivered to her the next day and read as follows:

> This letter is to inform you that your performance on the job at Delta Hosiery has been unsatisfactory in several areas.
>
> You have been tardy, absent without excuse and unresponsive to requests for improvement in your work habits.
>
> It is expected that you call in to report off from work. If you are off more than one day, we expect you to call in and let us know when you expect to return to work.
>
> Desiree, you have been warned verbally and in writing as to the above. Further incidents will result in your suspension from work for one day without pay. Any further incidents will result in your discharge from Delta Hosiery.
> I sincerely hope that this letter will cause you to improve in those areas mentioned and that further disciplinary action will not be necessary.

Desiree worked downstairs on Thursday and Friday, September 4 and 5, and on Monday, September 8. During this period, Murdock complained about her production and her absenteeism. Desiree testified that before August 27, 1980, she had not received such complaints. She also testified that the day after she was moved downstairs, Murdock started "yelling at me about my production and of my taking off days from work . . . ." She told him she was "really trying" and "he started mumbling some stuff . . . ." According to Desiree, he also directed that she stay at her seat and that she be kept supplied with material.

Carol Gross testified that, at one unspecified point in time, she heard Jim Murdock "screaming about [Desiree Evans'] time off." He insisted upon warning her in the presence of "Sharon and Suzanne," presumably Sharon Ritinger and Suzanne Evans, employees Murdock regarded as leaders in the union movement. Suzanne Evans, no relation to Desiree, testified that, on September 8, the day before Desiree quit, Murdock showed her the production records of Desiree to demonstrate that Desiree's production was low. When Suzanne asked why he was showing her these records, Murdock said, "Well, you're [the] speaker, aren't you." Suzanne also testified that she was aware that Desiree had received oral warnings for low production before September 8, although she did not specify when these were given. Suzanne also testified that other employees were given oral warnings for low production, a fact confirmed by other witnesses.

On September 9, Desiree worked 1 hour before punching out and quitting. Desiree testified that, on September 9, Jim Murdock again complained about her production. He said that the next time her production slipped or she missed another day she would be sent another notice, and that, if this happened again, she would be "out." She responded that she was trying and that the work downstairs was hard. Murdock said "if it wasn't for your sneezing and coughing all the time, you could do more." Carol Gross basically corroborated Desiree's testimony on this point although she could not hear all of the conversation. She testified that Desiree said she "couldn't help her production if it was down."

Later in this conversation Desiree testified that the following occurred:

> Well, while he was yelling at me, he also said to tell Ted Gatto, your Union man about this for all he cares and I said to him, I know why you're doing this to me and he said, why, and I said—wait—I told Jim I know why you're doing this to me and he said why and I said, I found out about your part of the Union or something like that and he said that isn't why, we don't even have a vote here, something like that.

On cross-examination, Desiree testified as follows: She said "I know why you're doing this to me." Murdock said, "why?" and Desiree said that he had found out that she was a union supporter. Murdock responded, "no, no, something about you don't have a vote and you could tell Gatto, your union man for all I care." Desiree was unable to remember which came first, the remark about Gatto, or her statement that Murdock was screaming at her because he found out about her supporting the Union. Carol Gross—who did not hear all of the conversation—testified that Murdock was "yelling a lot about the Union, Teddy, go tell Teddy something and then Desiree said, 'I don't know why you're doing this to me' . . . and he said, 'why because of that silly Union of your's? You said you don't even have a vote yet, you stupid ass.'" (Emphasis supplied.) Gross was not cross-examined on this point.

My view of the above conversation is that Desiree volunteered that she knew why Murdock was screaming at her and that it was because he found out she was a union supporter. I also believe that he denied this, as Desiree testified on direct. It was only then that Murdock told her that she could tell the union representative, Gatto, for all he cared. It would make no sense for Murdock to have said that she could tell Gatto about her contention that Murdock was mistreating her unless Desiree had implied that the mistreatment was based on her union affiliation and unless that remark came first. On cross-examination Desiree's account of the conversation seemed to support this view. Gross' account is somewhat in accord with Desiree's testimony on direct that the Gatto statement came first, but her testimony is a bit different from Desiree's and does not strike me as a coherent account of the conversation. She also admittedly did not hear all of the conversation. In any event, the testimony on this most crucial exchange was extremely vague. It was insufficient to support the General Counsel's view that it reflected Murdock's desire to punish Desiree because of her union activities.

After the conversation, Murdock walked away. Desiree finished her work, and, about a half hour later, she got up, told Murdock "I have had too much of this" and punched out. In response to Murdock's inquiries, Desiree said she was quitting. During this half-hour period Murdock and Desiree did not speak.

Suzanne Evans testified that, after Desiree had quit, she talked to Murdock and asked, "do you blame her for leaving the way you have been harassing her." According to Suzanne, Murdock said "no" and then "mumbled something and he told me I was next." On cross-examination, Suzanne was extremely confused as to when this incident took place and she even suggested that this had happened more than once. Nor does Suzanne's reference to Murdock having "mumbled" something offer the clarity of context which might render her testimony reliable enough to credit. Suzanne Evans was still employed at the time of the hearing in this case and there is no evidence in the record that Respondent retaliated against her for her union activities even though it is clear that Respondent knew she was a leader in the union effort. The General Counsel made no effort to rehabilitate Suzanne Evans after the considerable doubts about her reliability on this point created by her testimony on cross-examination. I therefore do not credit Suzanne's testimony that Murdock told her that he did not blame Desiree for quitting and that she was next.

Prior to August 27, 1980, Respondent had not issued written warning notices to employees. Since that date, apparently only three were issued, one of which was the September 4, 1980, letter to Desiree Evans. George Murdock testified that for the first few months of a person's employment no production warnings are given because the employee is presumed to be learning his or her job. No employees have been laid off for poor production or absenteeism. However, one person was terminated for poor production.

Desiree had had a number of absences since she began her employment in February 1980. She admitted she was absent a substantial portion of the time. Actually, she worked very few full 40-hour weeks, but this was true of most of the so-called full-time employees, according to Respondent's production records. In addition, in August and September 1980, there were many absences by other employees, as documented in notes kept by George Murdock. Desiree attributed most of her absences to dental appointments. She missed an entire week in July and another in August. Desiree testified that she probably was sick 1 week and on vacation another. She did work 40 hours in the week ending August 30 when she was moved downstairs. The week before she missed most of Tuesday. It is unclear whether this absence was excused or not, although Desiree testified generally that she always had permission for her absences and for leaving work early.

The production records for the week of August 30 do not indicate that Desiree's production was significantly less than that of other employees who worked 40 hours. Indeed, it appears that she topped several other employees. For the other weeks in August when she worked, Evans' production was higher than at least three other employees. It is difficult to compare production records, however, because of the different type of work done by each employee and the different hours worked. For example, some employees folded different types of hosiery and others did boxing or bagging work which is incapable of specificity. The last 2 weeks of her employment Desiree worked 16 and 9 hours, respectively, and it is difficult to compare her production records with other employees. She did, however, miss 2 days of work during this period and there is no specific evidence in the record as to why she missed those days or whether they were excused.

Two other employees were moved downstairs in July 1980. They remained downstairs doing folding work at the same time as Desiree was working downstairs. A number of employees had been moved between floors in the past. The working conditions downstairs were no different than they were upstairs except that there were less people working downstairs and the tables were set further apart.

According to Desiree, the work she was doing downstairs involved folding control top panty hose instead of the plain panty hose which she folded upstairs. Desiree testified that she had folded control top panty hose "once or twice before." She testified that the latter work was harder but she did not satisfactorily explain how or why it was harder. Actually, it appears that the work of the three folding employees downstairs was the same as the work upstairs. Respondent's production records make no distinction between types of panty hose folded although they do specify three or four other types of hosiery.

The evidence does not preponderate in favor of a finding that Evans was transferred downstairs and forced to quit her employment because of her union activities. I find nothing unlawful or untoward about the August 27 transfer of Evans. Other employees were assigned to work downstairs, including two employees in July just before Evans was transferred. The work was not substantially different than that being performed upstairs. I find no evidence supporting Evans' suggestion that the different type of panty hose she folded downstairs was harder to fold than those she had been folding in the past. She admittedly had folded this type of panty hose once or twice in the past. Nor was Evans considered a leader in the union effort. She was considered at most a follower and Mary Goff had had a question about whether she supported the Union or not. More importantly, 3 months had elapsed since the last union activity, and, in the interim, no one from management had engaged in any conversations with Evans about the Union. Nor did the transfer come on the heels of the complaint, as the General Counsel suggests. It came 3 weeks later. And Carol Gross' testimony about Murdock's reasons for transferring Desiree downstairs was not reliable. In these circumstances, I cannot conclude that the August 27 transfer of Evans to the downstairs work area was discriminatory or in retaliation for her union activities.

Working conditions imposed on Evans after August 27 were not unduly restrictive and they were not imposed for discriminatory reasons. She missed 2 days of work in early September and was issued a warning notice primarily for her absenteeism. Evans did miss these 2 days of work as she had other days earlier in her employment. Nor is there any credible evidence that the September 4 warning was issued because of Evans' union activity. The evidence that Murdock insisted on warning Evans in the presence of the two union leaders does not militate against this finding. Murdock could well have thought that, in the face of a bargaining demand and a Board complaint, he was protecting himself from a charge of discrimination by telling the union leaders that he was disciplining Evans for business reasons. Nor were Murdock's September 9 complaints shown to be based on Evans' union activities. Murdock screamed at Desiree about her production and her absenteeism as he had in the past after her transfer to the downstairs work area. But none of that criticism was shown to be based on her union activities. Desiree had received oral warnings for low production in the past and she told Murdock that she was trying to keep her production up. Murdock apparently was a volatile person who screamed at other employees about low production. His remarks about the Union on September 9 were not indicative of discriminatory motive because they followed Desiree's expressed opinion that he was mistreating her because she was a union supporter. Indeed, it appeared to me that Evans was baiting Murdock and trying to establish a discriminatory motive for alleged misconduct. Thus, the General Counsel has not shown that Respondent was responsible for harassing Evans or making her working conditions intolerable and that Respondent did this because of Desiree Evans' union activities or any other prohibited reason. Accordingly, Desiree's action in quitting her employment was entirely voluntary and not as a result of a constructive discharge in violation of the Act.

H. The Bargaining Order Request

The evidence shows that the Union had obtained valid authorization cards from 29 of the 53 employees in the bargaining unit[8] when it asked for recognition on May 28, 1980. Respondent declined to grant recognition and refused to bargain with the Union.

The General Counsel requests a bargaining order to remedy Respondent's refusal to bargain and the unfair labor practices committed in May and June 1980. I do not agree with the General Counsel that a bargaining order should issue in this case.

The standards for determining whether the unlawful conduct found herein requires a bargaining order are set forth in N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc., 395 U.S. 575 (1969). There, the Supreme Court held that such an order would be an appropriate remedy for: (1) "'exceptional' cases marked by 'outrageous' and 'pervasive' unfair labor practices . . . of 'such a nature that their coercive effects cannot be eliminated by the application of traditional remedies, with the result that a fair and reliable election cannot be had,'" and (2) "less extraordinary cases marked by less pervasive practices which nonetheless still have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election processes." The Court also noted that there was a "third category of minor or less extensive unfair labor practices, which, because of their minimal impact on the election machinery, will not sustain a bargaining order." However, the Court continued, "[t]here is . . . no per se rule that the commission of any unfair labor practice will automatically result in a §8(a)(5) violation and the issuance of an order to bargain." (395 U.S. at 613-615).

[8] I do not count the card of Lisa Everett. No one testified that she signed the card or that she signed the card on any particular date.

I find that the unfair labor practices in this case were not so serious that they cannot be eradicated by traditional remedies or that a fair election cannot be held in the future. The unfair labor practices were committed by Jim Murdock, who is now deceased, and Mary Goff, who was acting under his authority. Goff was an employee who was acting as Murdock's agent in polling employees. Her polling and questioning of employees is not likely to linger. Her remarks to two employees about the possibility of Respondent closing or moving the facility, while coercive, do not have the sting and the lingering effect such threats normally radiate because of Goff's low level in the management hierarchy. The impact of her remarks had some significance at the time they were made because employees believed that she acted with Jim Murdock's blessings in her discussions about the Union. This impact is lessened because of Murdock's death and also because, after the passage of time, a floor lady's statement to two employees about the closure of a plant cannot be regarded in the same light as a similar statement from a high-ranking management official. I cannot believe that employees would view her remarks so seriously after compliance with a cease-and-desist order. The same applies to Murdock's unfair labor practices. Jim Murdock was the person responsible for the decision not to hire Michele Evans and the threat to Carol Gross that her machine might be moved. With his death, I cannot say that the effects of these unfair labor practices cannot adequately be remedied by a cease-and-desist order and a hire and backpay remedy. Nor, for the same reason, do I believe that these unfair labor practices will recur. On balance, I believe that a free election could be held at Respondent's facility after the unfair labor practices herein are remedied by conventional means.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By interrogating employees about their union sympathies and those of other employees, by threatening the possible closing or moving of its facility because of the union activities of employees and by threatening the loss of employment because of union activities, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. By failing and refusing to hire Michele Evans after indicating that she had been hired and should report for work because of her sister's suspected union sympathies, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

3. The above violations are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

4. Respondent has not otherwise violated the Act.

5. The unfair labor practices committed by Respondent do not warrant the issuance of a bargaining order.

REMEDY

I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices found above and to post an appropriate notice. I shall also order that Respondent offer Michele Evans employment in the same position she would have been employed absent the discrimination against her. It will be further recommended that Respondent be required to make Michele Evans whole for any loss of earnings she may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against her. Such backpay and interest thereof shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[6]

Upon the basis of the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record in this case, I recommend the issuance of the following:

ORDER[7]

The Respondent, Delta Hosiery, Inc., its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

Spirit Mountain Farms, Inc. and Donald R. Brown, I. Lois Brown, and Marilyn E. Brown, Executor of the Estate of Robert H. Brown, deceased, a Limited Partnership, d/b/a Spirit Mountain Farms and Martin Hitt. Case 28-CA-6527

January 8, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JENKINS, ZIMMERMAN, AND HUNTER

Upon a charge filed on June 29, 1981, by Martin Hitt, an individual, and duly served on Spirit Mountain Farms, Inc., herein individually called Respondent Corporation and Donald R. Brown, I. Lois Brown, and Marilyn E. Brown, executor of the estate of Robert H. Brown, deceased, a limited partnership, herein individually called Respondent Partnership, d/b/a Spirit Mountain Farms, herein collectively called Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Acting Regional Director for Region 28, issued a complaint on July 23, 1981, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

The charge was filed on June 29, 1981, by the Charging Party, and duly served on Respondent by certified mail on or about the same day. The Acting Regional Director on July 23, 1981, issued a complaint and notice of hearing, which was received and signed for by Donald Brown on July 31, 1981. When no answer was filed, counsel for the General Counsel on August 13, 1981, sent, by ordinary mail, a letter advising Respondent that it had failed to timely file an answer to the complaint as required by the Board's Rules and Regulations and further informing Respondent of the consequences of its failure to timely file an answer thereto, namely, that such would have the effect of admitting each and every allegation in the complaint.

On August 31, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment on the pleadings. Subsequently, on September 8, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's motion should not be granted. Respondent has not filed a response to the Notice To Show Cause and, therefore, the allegations in the Motion for Summary Judgment stand uncontroverted.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, provides, inter alia: "All allegations in the complaint, if no answer is filed . . . shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board." As set forth above, Respondent has not filed an answer to the complaint; the time within which to file having passed, we find all allegations in the complaint to be true. There being no issues in dispute, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

1. At all times material herein, Respondent Corporation and Respondent Partnership have been affiliated business enterprises with common officers, ownership, directors, management, and supervison; have formulated and administered a common labor policy affecting employees of said operations; have shared common premises and facilities; have provided services for each other; have interchanged personnel with each other; and have held themselves out to the-public as a single integrated business enterprise.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent Corporation and Respondent Partnership constitute a single integrated business enterprise and a single employer within the meaning of Act.

2. At all times material herein, Respondent, with an office and place of business in Mohave Valley, Arizona, has been engaged in the business of producing, packaging, and selling fibre, grain, grass, fruit, and related products, including melons, and has packaged and sold melons which were produced by Respondent and other agricultural producers. During the past 12 months, Respondent in the course and conduct of its business operations, derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and sold and shipped from its Mohave Valley, Arizona, facilities products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of Arizona.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Workers Local P-78-B, United Food and Commercial Workers, AFL-CIO, herein called the Union, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

On or about June 23, 1981, Respondent discharged Charging Party Martin Hitt and, since that date, has failed and refused to reinstate him to his former position of employment. Respondent engaged in the acts and conduct described above because Martin Hitt refused to join the Union and to authorize Respondent to deduct periodic dues and initiation fees from his wages on behalf of the Union and in order to encourage employees to engage in such activities or other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

On the basis of the foregoing, we find that Respondent has discriminated, and is continuing to discriminate, in regard to hire, tenure, or terms and conditions of employment of its employees,[1] thereby encouraging membership in a labor organization, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We shall order that Respondent offer Martin Hitt immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if his job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed. Moreover, we shall order that Respondent make him whole, with interest, for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a consequence of the discrimination against him by payment to him of a sum equal to what he would have earned, less net earnings, to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950). Interest on the backpay shall be computed as set forth in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[2]

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Spirit Mountain Farms, Inc., and Donald R. Brown, I. Lois Brown, and Marilyn E. Brown, executor of the estate of Robert H. Brown, deceased, a limited partnership, d/b/a Spirit Mountain Farms, constitute a single integrated business enterprise and a single employer within the meaning of the Act.

2. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

3. Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Workers Local P-78-B, United Food and Commercial Workers, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

4. Respondent, by discharging Martin Hitt and by failing and refusing to reinstate him to his former position of employment, has discriminated against employees in order to encourage union membership and activities, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Spirit Mountain Farms, Inc., and Donald R. Brown, I. Lois Brown, and Marilyn E. Brown, executor of the estate of Robert H. Brown, deceased, a limited partnership, d/b/a Spirit Mountain Farms, Mohave Valley, Arizona, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

[1] The record indicates that Respondent is engaged, inter alia, in the business of packaging and selling melons produced by other agricultural producers. Accordingly, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, we find that Charging Party Hitt is an employee within the meaning of the Act. Employer Members of Grower-Shipper Vegetable Association of Central California, et al., 230 NLRB 1011 (1977).

(a) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against employees because they have refused to join Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Workers Local P-78-B, United Food and Commercial Workers, AFL-CIO, and have refused to authorize Respondent to deduct periodic dues and initiation fees from their wages on behalf of the Union, in order to encourage union activities or membership.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer Martin Hitt immediate and full reinstatement to his former position or, if his position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole, with interest, for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against him in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its facility in Mohave Valley, Arizona, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 28, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director for Region 28, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Michael D. Stevenson, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me in Las Vegas, Nevada, on

---

[1] Respondent has excepted to the Administrative Law Judge's denial of its motion for continuance. The granting or refusal of a continuance is within the discretion of the Administrative Law Judge. Sec. 102.43 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended. We have carefully examined the record and the exceptions and find that the Administrative Law Judge did not abuse his discretion when denying Respondent's request.

[2] Respondent has excepted to the central credibility finding made by the Administrative Law Judge, wherein he credited Jones' version of the August 27 telephone conversation. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless a clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[3] We hereby correct the Administrative Law Judge's Decision and recommended Order to reflect the General Counsel's agreement that backpay liability will be tolled as of May 11, 1981, rather than May 13, 1981.

In accordance with his partial dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on backpay due based on the formula set forth therein.

259 NLRB No. 138

June 4, 1981,[1] pursuant to a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 31 of the National Labor Relations Board on October 30, and which is based on a charge filed by William David Jones (herein called the Charging Party) on September 2. The complaint alleges that A & A Ornamental Iron, Inc. (herein called Respondent), has engaged in certain violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (herein called the Act).

Issue

The issue presented is whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act in a telephone conversation between Michael Ayers, a statutory supervisor, and Jones, a job applicant—wherein (1) Jones was interrogated by Ayers about his past union membership or affiliation; (2) Ayers advised Jones that Respondent did not hire individuals who were members of a union; (3) Ayers refused and continues to refuse to hire Jones because of the latter's present or past union affiliation.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Neither the General Counsel's nor Respondent's counsel filed a brief.[2]

Upon the entire record of the case, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS

Respondent admits that it is a Nevada corporation engaged in the business of fabrication of ornamental iron and miscellaneous steel and has a shop and office located in Las Vegas, Nevada. It further admits that during the past year, in the course and conduct of its business, it has sold and sent goods or services valued in excess of $50,000 to customers outside the State of Nevada. Accordingly it admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.[3]

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.[4]

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

Between December 1975 through November 1978, Jones was employed at a manufacturing plant in Spokane, Washington. While there, Jones had experience with a drill press, a grinder, and some subassembly. He also had prior experience with a welding torch from a high school training class. When Jones left his job in Spokane, due to layoff, he also elected withdrawal status from a Spokane Teamsters local.

At some point subsequent to his layoff, Jones moved to Las Vegas, and later to Florida, then back to Las Vegas. He held a series of short-term, unskilled jobs such as day labor, vacuum cleaner salesman, and construction worker.

On or about August 27, Jones, then age 24, went to a local Las Vegas office of the Nevada Employment Security Department, seeking employment through a job referral. He observed a job notice for "Shophand" which had been called in by Respondent. The job paid $4 per hour. After an interview by a job counselor to verify that Jones was qualified for the job, Jones was given a job referral card (G.C. Exh. 2) and was sent out for an interview.[5]

Jones first consulted a map at his home to determine the approximate location of the business. He found the street without great difficulty, but could not immediately locate the exact address. Jones went to a nearby restaurant and called Respondent on the telephone and asked for "Mike," the contact person on his referral card. Mike Ayers, age 24, shop foreman and Respondent's vice president, admitted receiving a telephone call in late afternoon on the day in question. However, he sharply disputes the contents of the conversation.

According to Jones, he told Ayers that he was on referral from the Nevada employment office and that he was applying for the job of "Shophand." Jones further explained that he was having trouble finding Respondent so he needed better directions. Ayers allegedly said, "Let me ask you a couple of questions first: How long have you been in the State?" To this, Jones responded, "Off and on for about two years." Ayers made no reply but then allegedly asked a second question: "Are you a member of union." Jones explained that he had been a member of the Teamsters, but that he was then on a withdrawal card. To this, Ayers replied that Respondent was not going to hire anybody from the Union. Again Jones reiterated that he was on withdrawal from the Union. However, Ayers said he knew of a local company who had hired a union member, but then was forced to close down because the new employee had tried to bring in the Union. Then Ayers referred Jones to still another local company which Ayers said did hire union members. Ayers concluded the conversation by telling

[2] In addition to not filing briefs, neither attorney notified me that they were waiving their right to file one. I am disappointed that this commonsense courtesy escaped their attention. Because Respondent's attorney in particular made reference on two occasions at the hearing as to what he expected to accomplish in his brief, a clerical employee expended needless time and energy making several telephone calls attempting to determine whether the briefs may have been timely filed, but possibly lost in the mails, or misplaced here.

[4] Respondent's answer was amended at the hearing to reflect the above.

[5] The General Counsel called as a witness Jenny Henderson, manager of the job order service unit. This witness testified that the job of shophand was a full-time position, for which four other persons were sent out in addition to Jones. Records show that a person named Anderson was ultimately hired for the position, but Ayers could not recall hiring him.

Jones that he could come in and file an application with Respondent, but that it would do Jones no good.

According to Ayers, the person he talked to was seeking employment as a "forklift operator." Ayers allegedly explained that Respondent had no such job available, but did have others which paid $4 per hour. At this point, Ayers said the person became nasty and abusive over the telephone and threatened to go to the Operating Engineers Union and get a job for $10 per hour. Ayers specifically denied the conversation as related by Jones.

In resolving this central credibility question in favor of Jones, I note the following factors: First, I found Jones to be a more credible witness both as to demeanor and content.[6] More specifically, I find Ayers' account of the conversation to be incredible. Why would Jones ask for a forklift job when his referral card clearly specified the job as shophand. Moreover, Respondent had never called in such a job, so no applicant for it would have been referred by the Nevada employment office.

While I discredit Ayers for the reasons stated above and specifically find that his testimony contains its own impeachment, I also find that Jones was corroborated in a significant and persuasive way.

The day after talking to Ayers, Jones talked to Vince Benneman, a business agent for Local 14, I.B.T. Jones related to Benneman his experience of the day before and Benneman referred him to the Board's office. At the hearing, Benneman did not testify, but the parties stipulated that Jones did in fact complain to Benneman the next day and tell him substantially the same facts concerning the conversation he had with Ayers the day before, just as Jones had testified at the hearing. This prompt complaint by Jones together with the absence of any reason as to why he would fabricate his testimony are additional factors which cause me to credit Jones and discredit Ayers.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

I begin with a recent Board-approved statement of law made by Administrative Law Judge Saunders:

> . . . Questions concerning former union membership and union preference, in the context of job application interviews, are inherently coercive, without accompanying threats, and are therefore violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. . . .[7]

Based on this authority, I find that, when Ayers asked Jones whether he was a member of a union and stated that Respondent did not hire union members, Respondent violated the Act.[8]

In addition, the Board has held that an employer violates Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act when it refuses to consider an application for employment for reasons proscribed by the Act.[9] Thus, I find that an employer is not permitted to refuse employment to a job applicant because of union membership or affiliation, reasons proscribed by the Act. I further find that Jones was not hired for those very reasons. Moreover, I find that Jones was qualified to perform the work of shophand and that Respondent had a vacancy as of August 27. Finally, I find that there is no evidence even to suggest that Jones would not have been hired in the absence of his protected activity. Accordingly, I find that, by not hiring Jones for the position of Shophand, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.[10]

In conclusion, I note that on May 11, 1981, less than a month before the hearing in this case was due to commence, Respondent sent Jones a letter which read as follows:

> Dear Mr. Jones:
>
> At this time our company has the position of Shophand available. If you are interested in applying, we would be more than happy to accept your application and offer you employment for that position. Due to the circumstances we would appreciate your reply to our offer in writing. If we do not hear from you by May 18, we will assume that you are not interested.
> B. N. Ayers [G.C. Exh. 3.]

On May 13, 1981, Jones wrote back to Respondent, "At this time I am unable to accept your job offer." (G.C. Exh. 4.) The General Counsel agreed that any backpay liability would be tolled as of May 13, 1981, and further stated that Jones did not desire to be hired by Respondent.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. A & A Ornamental Iron, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce, and business operations affecting commerce, within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, as amended.

2. International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act, as amended.

3. Respondent violated the Act as follows:

[6] What follows is an exchange between Ayers and myself wherein I was attempting to determine which of Respondent's current employees were related to him by blood or marriage:

> AYERS: Okay, Andy Young married my sister.
> JUDGE STEVENSON: So he is your brother-in-law.
> AYERS: Brother-in-law.
>
> JUDGE STEVENSON: And what is his [Andy Young] job?
> AYERS: He is not one of the five, though, but I don't consider him a Shophand, or what we would call "employee."
>
> JUDGE STEVENSON: What would you consider him? What does he do?
> AYERS: Shophand.
>
> JUDGE STEVENSON: He is a Shophand, but you don't consider him to be one of the five or more that you referred to a moment ago?
>
> AYERS: Well, do you consider your cousin an employee? I sure don't.

This last answer was given in a sarcastic and disrespectful tone of voice.

[10] Ayers testified that Respondent never hired a job applicant who failed to submit a job application. Putting aside that, even without an application, Respondent offered Jones an immediate job in a letter dated May 11, 1981—a matter to be considered below—I find that, in light of the credited testimony, it would have been entirely futile for Jones to file a job application with Respondent. Accordingly, this failure to file one in no way affects his rights in this case.

(a) Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating Jones, a job applicant, about his past union membership or union affiliation.

(b) Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by telling Jones that Respondent did not hire individuals who were members of a union.

(c) Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by refusing to hire Jones because of Jones' past or present union membership or affiliation.

THE REMEDY

Since I have found that A & A Ornamental Iron, Inc., has engaged in, and is engaging, in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, and that it take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act, as amended.

ORDER[11]

The Respondent, A & A Ornamental Iron, Inc., Las Vegas, Nevada, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

. Cease and desist from:

(a) Interrogating job applicants about union membership or affiliation.

(b) Telling job applicants that Respondent did not hire individuals who are or were members of or were affiliated with a union.

(c) Refusing to hire persons because they are members of or are affiliated with a union.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is deemed necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Make whole William David Jones by paying to him backpay from August 28 to May 13, 1981, computed in accordance with the formula approved in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[12]

(b) Post at its place of business in Las Vegas, Nevada, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[13] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 31, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 31, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On September 9, 1981, Administrative Law Judge William A. Gershuny issued the attached Supplemental Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed limited cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Supplemental Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.[1]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Robert E. Cashdollar, Sr., d/b/a Nelson Metal Fabricating, Butler, Pennsylvania, his officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall pay Eugene Zdral the sum of $3,441.38, Larry Jurysta the sum of $3,087.46, and Dennis Grame the sum of $5,763.74, plus interest to be computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). Payment of these sums shall be minus any taxes required to be withheld by Respondent under Federal, state, and local law.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

WILLIAM A. GERSHUNY, Administrative Law Judge: This backpay proceeding, initiated by specification dated January 29, 1981, followed court of appeals enforcement on October 17, 1980, of a Board Decision and Order of February 1, 1980, 247 NLRB 730, ordering reinstatement and backpay for four employees found to have been wrongfully discharged by Respondent on October 24, 1978.

A hearing was conducted in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on August 31, 1981.

Counsel for the General Counsel admits that valid offers of reinstatement were made and declined on January 16, 1981, and that one of the four employees, Robert Black, sustained no wage loss.

The record facts are undisputed and support the backpay computations set forth in Appendices A-1 through A-10, B-1 through B-10, and C-1 through C-10. [Omitted from publication.] Payroll records provided for inspection by Respondent reflect the average weekly hours worked by each of the three employees, their rates of pay, and the amounts of pay increases thereafter received by comparable employees. The wage policy of Respondent is further reflected in a written notice to employees and, while to some extent pay raises were dependent on individual performance, there was no evidence offered which would suggest, let alone support, a finding, that any of the three employees would not have qualified for such raises.

Excess mileage data, representing mileage to and from interim employment in excess of mileage to and from Respondent's place of business, was credibly established by employee testimony. The mileage cost computations of the Board's field examiner were made on the basis of 17 cents per mile, a not unreasonable basis, and one employed by the Internal Revenue Service for business vehicle use. Union dues in connection with interim employment were establshed by information obtained from local union records. And, finally, offsetting interim earnings were established through reports of interim employers and the credible testimony of the three employees themselves that no other income was derived during the period from employment of any kind. There is no evidence that any of the employees neglected to seek interim employment or intentionally interfered with their ability to obtain or maintain such employment. While this case raises no factual issues, Respondent's answer does raise a number of legal ones. The first, a request for jury trial, was denied at the hearing on authority of N.L.R.B. v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1 (1937). The second, that travel expenses and union dues are not proper elements of a backpay award generally or under the specific facts of this case, similarly is denied, and to that extent Respondent's answer is stricken, on authority

[1] The General Counsel's exceptions erroneously state that the Administrative Law Judge failed to rule on his motion to strike those portions of Respondent's answer challenging the use of the F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), quarterly backpay computation formula in this case. As Respondent admits in its exceptions, the Administrative Law Judge did, in fact, grant the General Counsel's motion to strike at the hearing.

We, however, do not adopt the Administrative Law Judge's discussion of the supposed inequities of the Woolworth formula as applied to the facts of this case, where two of the discriminatees had interim earnings exceeding gross backpay.

The Board with longstanding court approval orders reinstatement and backpay—utilizing a quarterly balancing—against interim earnings—of the amount that would have been due the employee from his former employer. The purpose of this quarterly balancing is to discourage delay of an offer of reinstatement. Such an offer tolls backpay liability. An employer is, of course, entitled to resist reinstatement and backpay up to the point of court enforcement of the Board's order. If the employer is successful, it avoids both the duty to reinstate and to pay backpay. If it is not, the result may be, as here: two of the employees, who were skilled, achieved more gainful employment for the greater part of the backpay period. A third employee, unskilled, also achieved more gainful employment, but for a shorter period. In effect this Respondent took the risk of such variables and lost.

of Crossett Lumber Company, 8 NLRB 440, 497–498 (1938), and its progeny.

The third issue—Respondent's principal contention—that the computation of backpay on a quarterly basis is without foundation in law, equity, or reason, similarly was rejected at the hearing, and to that extent Respondent's answer was stricken on authority of F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Seven-Up Bottling Company of Miami, Inc., 344 U.S. 344 (1953). Woolworth, of course, represented a departure by the Board from its original method for computation of backpay established in Pennsylvania Greyhound Line, Inc., 1 NLRB 1, 51 (1935), enfd. 303 U.S. 261 (1938). Respondent seeks a return to that method of computing backpay based on the entire period of unemployment. But there is yet another side to Respondent's contention which must be addressed—that the quarterly method of computation was never intended by the Woolworth Board to be a rigid, inflexible one, to be applied without regard to the circumstances of the particular case. Indeed, as the Supreme Court in Seven-Up noted, the pre-Woolworth rule was varied on a case-by-case basis where its application was oppressive. Based on strong suggestions by the Board in Seven-Up that it would continue to look to the special facts of each case in computing backpay, the Supreme Court commented, "We assume that the Woolworth formula will be applied in like manner." 344 U.S. at 350.

In this case, a number of factors warrant consideration in applying Woolworth. First, as the following computations indicate, two of the three employees actually earned considerably more through other employment than they would have earned in the employ of Respondent:

Eugene Zdral
Gross wages loss, including pay raises	$12,723.12
Interim earnings, less expenses	14,986.97
Wage loss	0
Larry Jurysta
Gross wages loss, including pay increases	$14,377.35
Interim Earnings, less expenses	28,457.36
Wage loss	0
Dennis Grame
Gross wages loss, including pay increases	$11,778.36
Interim Earnings, less expenses	8,858.56
Wage loss	$2,919.80

Yet, applying the quarterly method of computation, Respondent's liability for backpay for those two employees exceeds $6,500, plus interest. The third employee actually earned $2,900 less through interim employment, yet, under the quarterly formula, he is entitled to $5,700, plus interest. Second, there is no evidence and no suggestion that Respondent delayed making an offer of reinstatement in order to diminish his backpay liability. His right to contest his liability under the Act, of course, is not challenged and the delay is wholly attributable to the 2-year litigative process: 6 months to reach hearing; 6 months for a recommended Decision and Order; 4 months for the Board Decision and Order; and 9 months for appellate court review. No contempt proceedings were required and a valid offer of reinstatement was made within 90 days of appellate court enforcement. Third, it is noteworthy that reinstatement was declined, despite the fact that two of the three employees were unemployed at the time. And fourth, had reinstatement been offered following either the Administrative Law Judge's Decision of September 1979 or the Board's Decision and Order of January 1980, each employee presumably would have declined it, since, at both times, each was employed and earning considerably more in other employment.

While there may be considerable merit, under the circumstances of this case, to Respondent's contention that application of the Woolworth formula produces a punitive remedy, it is one which properly is directed to the Board itself. Despite its assurances to the Supreme Court in 1953 to the contrary, the Board appears to have adopted an inflexible policy as to the application of Woolworth. An administrative law judge has no authority to disregard or revise established Board policy.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following:

ORDER[1]

The Respondent, Robert E. Cashdollar, Sr., d/b/a Nelson Metal Fabricating, Butler, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall make whole the following individuals by paying them the amount set forth opposite their name, plus interest thereon accrued to the date of payment and computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977), less tax withholdings required by Federal and state law:

Eugene Zdral	$3,441.38
Larry Jurysta	3,087.46
Dennis Grame	5,763.74

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On April 16, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Morton Needelman issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions, a supporting brief, and an answering brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] of the Administrative Law Judge only to the extent consistent herewith, to modify the remedy,[3] and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein and set forth in full below.

The facts, more fully set out in the Decision of the Administrative Law Judge, indicate that in late 1979 and early 1980 the Union attempted to organize several of Respondent's beauty salons including one in Camp Springs, Maryland. From the outset Camp Springs employee Barbara Akers supported the Union. She passed messages from the organizers to her coworkers, distributed union literature, and solicited authorization cards. The evidence shows her efforts on behalf of the Union were known to Camp Springs Manager Dale Terwilliger. In response to the organizational effort, Respondent distributed literature adverse to union membership in mid-January 1980,[4] and called a meeting on February 9 at which Supervisor Freide told approximately 15 employees of Respondent's opposition to the Union. As set forth below, Freide's remarks included a number of statements violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The Administrative Law Judge concluded, and we agree, that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) on February 20 by discharging Akers because of her protected union activities.[5] We also agree with the Administrative Law Judge that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by virtue of Freide's statements during the February 9 meeting that he would never engage in collective bargaining with a union. Such a statement constitutes an anticipatory refusal to bargain, as fully detailed in the Administrative Law Judge's Decision. We also find, contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, that Freide's statements at the February 9 meeting threatening to discharge or replace employees if they went on strike, and that if they objected to his views about unions they could leave, as well as his earlier solicitation and interrogation of Karen Davis, were all violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

During Freide's conversation with employee Karen Davis in January, he asked Davis if she had heard about the Union. He also remarked to Davis that since she had been in the business a long time and knew that a union could not help the employees she should discourage the "young girls" from joining the Union. We do not agree with the Administrative Law Judge that the conversation was so brief and conducted in such a casual manner as to preclude an inference of improper interference or a tendency to be coercive.[6] The solicitation of Karen Davis to reject the Union is, in itself, an 8(a)(1) violation regardless of the alleged noncoercive tenor of the supervisor's actual remarks during such conversation.[7] By soliciting help from Davis individually, Freide was actually soliciting her to influence other employees to support Respondent

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] In accordance with his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth therein.

In the absence of exceptions we adopt pro forma the Administrative Law Judge's finding that there was no evidence that Terwilliger engaged in illegal interrogations of employees concerning an employees' meeting which took place sometime in February. In reaching this conclusion, we note that the General Counsel's exceptions refer only to alleged unlawful interrogation by Freide. We likewise adopt pro forma his failure to find unlawful certain restrictions placed on employee discussions of the Union.

[3] See Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), for rationale on interest payments.

[4] Hereinafter all dates are 1980 unless otherwise specified.

[5] Member Jenkins does not rely on Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), cited by the Administrative Law Judge. That decision concerns identifying the cause of a discharge where a genuine lawful and a genuine unlawful reason exist. Where, as here, the asserted lawful reason is found to be a pretext, only one genuine reason remains—the unlawful one. To attempt to apply Wright Line in such a situation is futile, confusing, and misleading.

[6] The Administrative Law Judge's reliance on Delco-Remy, Div. of General Motors v. N.L.R.B., 596 F.2d 1295 (5th Cir. 1979), in which the court denied enforcement of a Board Order is, with all due respect to that court, inconsistent with current Board law. It is well settled that the duty of an administrative law judge is "to apply established Board precedent which the Supreme Court has not reversed." Iowa Beef Packers, Inc., 144 NLRB 615, 616 (1965).

[7] Electrical Fittings Corporation, a Subsidiary of I-T-E Imperial Corporation, 216 NLRB 1076 (1975).

against union representation.[8] It is equally well settled that interrogation of employees with respect to their union attitudes and sympathies without a legitimate purpose and adequate assurances against reprisal, which is the situation disclosed by this record, is inherently coercive, and hence violates Section 8(a)(1).[9]

We turn next to Freide's threat on February 9 to discharge or replace the employees if they went on strike. The record reveals that the three employee witnesses gave somewhat different versions of Freide's remarks at the February 9 meeting with respect to the possibility of being replaced or fired. According to Akers, Freide said that, if the employees went on strike, he would replace them. Kyle testified that Freide said, if the employees went on strike, they would either lose their jobs or be replaced. Davis testified that Freide said "that if we went union, he would fire us all."

Although the Administrative Law Judge made no credibility determinations with respect to the differences in these witnesses' testimony, we find it unnecessary to resolve any inconsistency in these accounts. The threat to fire strikers is clearly illegal. Additionally, the threat to replace strikers in the context presented here is likewise unlawful. An analysis of Respondent's entire antiunion campaign reveals an implicit warning that in dealing with the Union Respondent would so conduct the negotiations that a strike would result. Thus, there was but one theme: the inevitability of a strike if the employees selected the Union as their bargaining representative, and the dire consequences of such a strike, namely, the loss of jobs by the strikers. As the Administrative Law Judge here held, "Such an anticipatory refusal to bargain interferes with employees' free choice since it tends to create an atmosphere of futility, and of the inevitability of failure and concomitant employer-employee strife which, in turn, may lead to strikes and loss of jobs." We conclude that such appeals to the employees created an atmosphere rendering the exercise of free choice impossible and tended to interfere with, restrain, and coerce its employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed by Section 7. Accordingly, the Respondent's threats of discharge or replacement were violative of Section 8(a)(1).[10]

Also, as found by the Administrative Law Judge, the accounts of witnesses Akers and Kyle indicate that at this February 9 meeting Freide said in effect that he did not want a union, that in his opinion a union brought trouble, and that if the employees did not like it they could leave. Although the Administrative Law Judge acknowledged that this statement could be interpreted as a threat of reprisal, he found that, since it was capable of a lawful interpretation, it was protected by Section 8(c) of the Act. This analysis is inconsistent with established Board law. In accord with precedent, we find that such remarks constitute a veiled threat designed to convey the impression that management considers continued employment incompatible with engaging in union activities. Markle Manufacturing Company of San Antonio, 239 NLRB 1353 (1979).[11] Accordingly, we conclude that Respondent's statement comes within that interference and coercion proscribed by Section 8(a)(1).

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Vincent et Vincent of Allentown Mall, Inc., Camp Springs, Maryland, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Telling employees that Respondent would not bargain with Barbers and Cosmetologists Division, United Food and Commercial Workers' Union, Local 400, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization.

(b) Discouraging membership in Barbers and Cosmetologists Division, United Food and Commercial Workers' Union, Local 400, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization, by discharging employees or by discriminating in any other manner against employees in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment.

(c) Telling employees that continued employment is incompatible with union activity.

(d) Threatening employees that if they go on strike they will be discharged, fired, or replaced.

(e) Soliciting employees for the purpose of discouraging other employees from joining the Union.

(f) Interrogating employees about the Union.

(g) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action:

(a) Offer Barbara Akers immediate and full reinstatement to her former job or, if that job no longer exists to a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make her whole for any loss of pay she may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against her by payment to her of a sum of money equal to the amount she normally would have earned as wages, plus interest, in the manner set forth in the section of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision entitled "The Remedy."

[8] See Amber Delivery Service, Inc., 250 NLRB 63 (1980).

[9] See Aero Corporation, 233 NLRB 401 (1977).

[10] Moreover, the Board has held that an employer violates the Act when he avers that strikers, whether for economic or unfair labor practice reasons, will be permanently replaced immediately upon striking, without limiting his statements to a lawful pronouncement that he is legally entitled to replace economic strikers only. See Huck Manufacturing Company, 254 NLRB 739 (1981).

[11] In addition, we find the threat to continued employment by Freide in a context of the antiunion remarks set forth above was in fact designed to have a coercive effect on the employees.

VINCENT ET VINCENT OF ALLENTOWN MALL, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MORTON NEEDLEMAN, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard in Washington, D.C., on January 27, 1981. The charges were originally filed by the Barbers and Cosmetologists Division, United Food and Commercial Workers' Union, Local 400, AFL-CIO, and later amended on May 15, 1980.[1] The complaint was issued on July 17, 1980. It alleges that Vincent et Vincent of Allentown Mall, Inc. (hereinafter Respondent), acting through its treasurer, William Freide, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (hereinafter Act), in January and February 1980 by interfering with, restraining, and coercing employees at its Camp Springs, Maryland, location in the exercise of their rights guaranteed under Section 7 of the Act by engaging in the following practices: threatening employees with discharge for supporting the Union; interrogating employees regarding their own and their fellow employees' union activities; soliciting employees to discourage their fellow employees from supporting the Union; telling employees that Respondent would close down before it would bargain with the Union; saying to employees that Respondent would not have a union at the Camp Springs, Maryland, shop, and if the employees did not like that prospect, they could leave. The complaint further alleges that Respondent discriminated against Barbara E. Akers by terminating her employment because of her membership in, assistance to, and activities on behalf of the Union.

Respondent's answer denied the substantive allegations of the complaint, but at the hearing Respondent admitted all jurisdictional facts as well as allegations relating to status of the Union as a labor organization and the supervisory status of William Freide and Dale Terwilliger, manager of Respondent's Allentown Mall salon. As a result of these admissions, the issues at the hearing were limited to (1) whether William Freide engaged in threats, solicitation, and interrogation which interfered with and coerced employees in the exercise of their rights under Section 7; and (2) whether Respondent discriminated against Barbara Akers by firing her because of her union acitivties.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate in the hearings by introducing evidence, examining and cross-examining witnesses, and presenting oral argument. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and Respondent on March 25, 1981. Upon the entire record, including my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

A. Respondent's Business; the Union's Labor Organization Status; Commerce; The Role of William Freide

The jurisdictional facts are not in dispute. Respondent, Vincent et Vincent of Allentown Mall, Inc., a Maryland corporation, operates a beauty salon in the Allentown Mall in Camp Springs, Maryland. Respondent corporation is part of a related chain of 16 corporations which operate 16 beauty salons under the trade name "Hair Pair" in the Washington, D.C., area.[2]

Respondent and all other corporations in the chain are owned and controlled by Vincent Gesumaria, president, Walter W. Stern, vice president, William Freide, treasurer, and Meyer Samuels, secretary. By virtue of the control exercise by these officers over the business operations and labor relations policies of the entire chain, the 16 corporations are properly considered as a single employer.

During the 12-month period prior to the issuance of the complaint, a representative period, the gross volume of business from the operations of the various beauty salons in Respondent's chain exceeded $500,000. During the same period, Respondent purchased and recieved products valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Maryland.[3]

Thus, it is undisputed that Respondent is, and has been, an "employer" as defined in Section 2(2) of the Act; that Respondent is, and has been, engaged in "commerce" and in operations "affecting commerce" as defined in Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, respectively; that the Union is, and has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act; and that William Freide is, and has been, an agent of Respondent and a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

B. Background; Union Activity; Alleged 8(a)(1) Violations

This matter involves a labor-relations conflict which arose between January and February 20, 1980, at Respondent's beauty salon in the Allentown Shopping Mall in Camp Springs, Maryland. The Camp Springs salon employs 18 workers who are variously classified as receptionists, hairdressers (or haircutters or operators), and shampoo girls. From the time the Camp Springs salon opened 7 years ago, its has been managed by Dale Terwilliger. Respondent's treasurer, William Freide, regularly calls at the Camp Springs salon as part of his chainwide supervisory responsibilities.

In the background of the Camp Springs labor dispute was an attempt by the Union to organize several of Respondent's shops including the salon on Seminary Road in Virginia, where the Union had planted one of its paid organizers, Lisa O'Leary-Young, to work as a shampoo girl. In mid-December 1979, Freide learned that a union campaign was underway at Seminary Road. His reaction to the campaign was described as follows by O'Leary-Young:

[1] After the complaint issued, the Barbers, Beauticians and Allied Industries International Association merged into the United Food and Commercial Workers' Union (hereinafter Union). The name in the case has been changed to reflect this merger.

[2] The complaint refers to seven corporations. Freide testified that two of the salons listed in the complaint are not Hair Pair shops. In all, there are 16 corporations under the same management, including Vincent et Vincent of Allentown Mall, which operate 16 "Hair Pair" salons in the Washington, D.C., area.

[3] See stipulation of February 24, 1981.

> He told the employees that he was very upset about the union, that he did not want a a union in the shop, he would not have a union in his shop, he wouldn't have anybody that belonged to a union working in his shop, they could just leave if they didn't like it, told them he was very distressed that there was a paid union organizer working at his shop. He told the employees that if they wanted to walk in the cold out on the picket line for however long they wanted to do it, that was fine with him, he didn't care.
> He told all the employees that if they joined the union or tried to join the union, that they would be black listed and that they would not get a job anywhere else and no one would want to hire them, and then he also made references to look what unions had done to the United Auto Workers and some stuff about Jimmy Hoffa and other matters like that.[4]

The testimony of O'Leary-Young concerning Freide's attitude toward union activity at Seminary Road was offered (and received without objection) as evidence of union animus on the part of Respondent, and not as proof of a substantive 8(a)(1) violation. Freide's remarks during the Seminary Road campaign led eventually to the filing by the Union of unfair labor practice charges against Respondent, but these charges were not pursued after the Union was defeated in a representation election.

While the instant complaint makes no mention of the Seminary Road campaign, Respondent was put on notice even before this proceeding began that the Seminary Road remarks, which contain a patently unlawful threat of retaliation if the Union is supported, would be offered to show Respondent's general hostility to the Union's campaign. Since nothing in O'Leary-Young's account of Freide's remarks on Seminary Road was contradicted by Respondent, her testimony should at least be considered as evidence of Freide's general attitude toward the Union which may be weighed against other evidence indicative of a possible change in his attitude. As shown in the evidence reviewed below, there is no evidence whatever of such a change in attitude.

Soon after the Camp Springs organizational campaign began on January 14, 1980, Freide handed Barbara Akers and Becky Kyle, haircutters, a Chamber of Commerce pamphlet outlining the case against union membership. Akers, the alleged 8(a)(3) discriminatee, testified that Freide said, "Lisa [Lisa O'Leary-Young] thinks I can't fire you, I'll show you that I can." This testimony, however, was uncorroborated since it was not recalled by Kyle. Later, Freide asked haircutter Karen Davis if she had heard about the Union. He also remarked to Davis that since she had been in the business a long time and knew that a union could not help the employees, she should discourage the "young girls" from joining the Union. Freide then took a union flyer away from Davis, and told her that she need not read this material. Respondent's attitude toward the Union was also demonstrated by the rule imposed by Manager Terwilliger forbidding employees to discuss the Union in the shop, although similar restrictions were not imposed on other private conversations.

In response to management's opposition to the organizational effort, several employees asked Freide to attend a meeting at the Camp Springs salon on February 9, 1980. Present at the meeting were Freide and some 15 employees. In Freide's version of what was said at this meeting, he was so scrupulous in avoiding any mention of the Union that he even refrained from bringing up his opposition to the signing of organizational cards, although he claims to have given some general advice warning the employees against the ill-advised singing of any papers.

Freide's account of what he said at the February 9 meeting taxes credulity. For even he concedes that the meeting was called to discuss employee grievances in the context of the Union's organizational campaign which management opposed. It is implausible that in such a setting the Union and its organizational effort were not mentioned by both the employees and Freide. In a word, Freide's version of what was not discussed, "I do not remember discussing unions," is so incredible, that I do not accept his version of what was said.

On the other hand, the testimony of three operators who attended the February 9 meeting (Akers and two other employees, Kyle and Davis) contains nothing which is innately unbelievable, and in giving testimony they seemed to be straight forwarded and sincere. This is not to say, however, that I have assigned equal probative weight to all facets of their testimony: corroborated recall was given great weight, while a single witness' uncorronorated version of what was said (in circumstances where corroboration was readily available) was given none. But it should be emphasized that differences in the ability of these three witnesses to recall uniformly all that was said at the meeting, which goes to the weight to be assigned a particular version of what happened, is in sharp contrast to the inherently incredible statement by Freide that the Union was never discussed at all.

According to the three witnesses, at the February 9 meeting the employees (through Becky Kyle, a haircutter and spokesperson for the employees) cited their grievances respecting pay, health benefits, and working conditions as their reasons for wanting the Union. All three witnesses testified that Freide responded by saying that he did not want a union, that in his opinion a union brought trouble, and that if the employees objected to his views about unions they could leave.

With respect to the possibility of being replaced or fired, the three employees gave somewhat different versions of Freide's remarks. According to Akers, Freide said that, if the employees went on strike, he would replace them. Kyle testified that Freide said, if the employees went on strike, they would either lose their jobs or be replaced. Davis testified that Freide said "that if we went union, he would fire us all."

[4] At the time of the hearing herein, O'Leary-Young was a full-time employee of the union. O'Leary-Young has never worked at Respondent's Camp Springs shop. She voluntarily left the Seminary Road shop in February 1980.

Finally, Akers and Kyle testified that at the February 9 meeting Freide said he would never engage in collective bargaining with a union, and that if the employees went on strike they would lose their jobs.[5] This statement, which significantly was not part of casual conversation with a single worker, but instead was announced before practically all the employees who had gathered to hear management's response to the Union's organizational campaign, is an unfair labor practice under Section 8(a)(1) of the the Act as alleged in complaint paragraph 5(d). Such an anticipatory refusal to bargain interferes with employees' free choice since it tends to create an atomosphere of futility, and of the inevitability of failure and concomitant employer-employee strife which, in turn, may lead to strikes and loss of jobs. Moreover, Freide's statement that, in effect, he would never come to the bargaining table with an open mind (scarcely an accurate prediction if the statutory obligation to bargain in good faith is to be met) was calculated to have a coercive effect on employees who, "no more than the generality of mankind, are inclined to indulge in futile acts." The Trane Company (Clarksville Manufacturing Division), 137 NLRB 1506, 1510 (1962).

Apart from Freide's remarks about his prospective refusal to bargain, the proof of other alleged 8(a)(1) violations has gaping holes. Thus, the evidence of alleged threats of reprisals by Freide for union activity, i.e., his alleged statement that "Lisa thinks I can't fire you, I'll show you that I can," and a threat purportedly made at the February 9 meeting, is murky. The "Lisa" statement could be recalled by only one of the two persons to whom it was directed, and two of the three witnesses who were present at the February 9 meeting did not even claim that there were any threats made of firing because of union activity.

Equally unimpressive is the evidence introduced to show that Freide solicited Karen Davis to discourage the "young girls" from joining the Union and improperly interrogated Davis about the Union. As far as the record will allow, this conversation, involving Freide, Davis, and one other employee (in contrast to the February 9 meeting when nearly all the employees were gathered to hear management's views), was so brief and conducted in such a casual manner as to preclude an inference of improper interference or a tendency to be coercive. See Delco-Remy Division of General Motors Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 596 F.2d 1295 (5th Cir. 1979). In addition, there is no reliable evidence that Dale Terwilliger engaged in illegal interrogations of employees. The record shows that Terwilliger asked several employees about what was discussed at an employees' meeting held sometime in February (but not the February 9 meeting). Terwilliger's interest, however, is understandable since he had received an anonymous telephone threat that his arms would be broken if he opposed the Union. There is no evidence linking this phone call with any of the employees or the Union, but the call explains why Terwilliger asked the employees what was discussed at a meeting held prior to the telephone call.

Finally, the evidence is weak that Freide said that continued employment is incompatible with union activity as alleged in paragraph 5(e) of the complaint. In the account given by two witnesses (Akers and Kyle), what Freide said, in effect, was that he did not want a union, that in his opinion a union brought trouble, and that if the employees objected to his views they could leave. While these remarks could conceivably be interpreted by employeess as an implied threat of reprisal if union activity continues, it is equally plausible that the remarks were preceived by employees as simply a confirmation that Freide does not like unions, an opinion which he had the right to express under Section 8(c) of the Act, and which could hardly have come as a suprise to the employees.

In sum, what the record shows is that Freide was more cautious and circumspect in his conduct during the Camp Springs campaign than he had been at Seminary Road, but his hostility to the Union remained firm as shown when he overstepped the line of permissible antiunion argument and engaged in unlawful interference by saying he would not bargain collectively. As for the other alleged 8(a)(1) violations cited in complaint paragraphs 5(a), (b), (c), and (e), the evidence is either too meager to support an order, or there was a total failure of proof.

C. The Discharge of Barbara Akers: The Alleged 8(a)(3) Violation

From the outset of the Camp Springs campaign in January 1980, Barbara Akers was identified to union organizers as an employee who was actively seeking a union, and was willing to help organize one. Thereafter, beginning on January 14, 1980, Akers became one of the intermediaries between the union organizers, John Brown and Lisa O'Leary-Young, and the employees of the salon. Akers passed messages from the organizers to her coworkers, distributed union literature, and solicited authorization cards. Her efforts on behalf of the Union must have been known to Dale Terwilliger since he was seen by Terwilliger in conversation with organizer Brown, who wears a windbreaker with the words "Local 400" emblazoned on the back. It is also reasonable to infer that Terwilliger passed on his knowledge of Aker's union activity to Freide, given the fact that Freide was so vehemently opposed to any union attempt to organize his shops.[6]

The chain of events which led to the firing of Barbara Akers on February 20, 1980, began innocently enough when Akers interrupted a conversation between the receptionsiat, Denise Edwards, and Patricia Hunt, an operator, by remarking that Edwards should not believe everything she heard.[7] This caused Edwards to ask Terwilliger to reprimand Akers about interrupting her conversations. At this point, Freide happened to enter the salon on one of his periodic visits. Terwilliger conveyed to Freide Edwards' request to reprimand Akers. Akers was then asked by Friede to step outside the salon and into the public area of the mall. Akers refused to step outside, insisting that her job or "business" be discussed on the jobsite. Freide then spoke to her in the reception area of the salon. He accused Akers of harassing other employees and spreading rumors and threats. Akers became agitated, and she asked him in a loud voice to identify specific employees whom she had threatened. Freide told her to lower her voice. She refused. Freide told her to leave. Akers asked whether she was fired. At first, Freide replied that she was not fired, and that Akers should "go back and read [her] book." Akers replied, "What, my law book," an obvious reference to her legal right to engage in union activity. As Akers was walking to her station, she was recalled by Freide who said that she was fired for being rude. Akers was not given an opportunity to obtain further elaboration from Freide about the charge that she was spreading rumors or making threats.

[5] Akers: "He said if we went on strike, he would replace us, and he said he would not bargain in any collective bargaining table"; Kyle: "He told us that if we went on strikes . . . . that we'd all lose our jobs, we would be replaced. And, he said, even if we were to get in the union and he was to be at a bargaining table, that he didn't have to bargain at all."

[6] Freide's testimony that he never discussed union activity with Terwilliger is unbelievable and, in fact, was contradicted by Freide's own statement that "Dale [Terwilliger] had told me that there were rumors because these people had come in passing out pamphlets . . . ."

The firing of Barbara Akers was an unusual occurrence. She was a competent haircutter, and as Freide testified, "you don't let good hair dresses go." Apparently, Akers was so proficient that she was hired on two occasions. She worked for Respondent between 1976 and 1978, left briefly to work for another salon, and then was rehired in the fall of 1978. That her services were highly regarded is also shown by the fact that Freide interceded on her behalf to ease tensions which had arisen among Akers, a shampoo girl, and an assistant manager.

While Respondent's employees often leave on their own, discharges are so rare that in Respondent's entire chain there have been less than 6 discharges in 20 years, and prior to the Akers discharge, Freide had not been personally involved in a single firing. All discharges, according to Freide, represent "less than 1 to 5 percent . . . a minute amount."

As Freide would have it, this rare event—the firing of Barabra Akers on February 20, 1980—was justified because "she was rude, abusive and impossible." But the record shows that management of Respondent ordinarily does not react as severely as Freide did on February 20 to other brief flurries of indecorous or even embarassing behavior. There have been several instances when voices have been raised in the presence of customers, and no one was fired. Thus, in early 1980, while operator Becky Kyle was discussing with a customer the benefits of union membership, she was reprimanded in a loud voice by Dale Terwilliger and told not to discuss the Union. On still another occasion during the summer 1980, operator Karen Davis was reprimanded by Terwilliger, who used a loud and vociferous tone in the presence of customers.

These incidents indicate that management of Respondent is extremely reluctant to fire capable employees. Moreover, there is evidence that even if just cause arises, the employee will usually be given a second or even a third chance to mend her ways. Moreover, should an employee be discharged, there is precedent for her to be reinstated. Against this background, it is simply not plausible that Freide would allow such a trivial incident—Barbara Akers' interruption of a conversation (significantly, not work but apparently a private conversation) between Denise Edwards and Patricia Hunt and Akers' subsequent heated, but brief, exchange with Freide—to assume such serious proportions that it would lead to the discharge of such a capable worker, unless there was an overriding other reason. As it happens, there is positive evidence that Respondent was actively searching for a pretext to fire Akers because of union activity. On February 20, the very day she was fired, Dale Terwilliger was overheard to say that if Akers was just 5 minutes late "she's gone." Besides, it is noteworthy that the conversation between Freide and Akers on February 20 did not center on whether it was proper or improper, polite or impolite, to interrupt Denise Edwards; the conversation became heated when Freide brought up the real subject which was bothering management—Akers' efforts on behalf of the Union, which he characterized as spreading rumors and threats.

Under the Board's decision in Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), first, the General Counsel must make a prima facie showing that protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the employer's decision to discharge an employee. Once this is established, the burden shifts to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected activity.

The General Counsel has clearly met its burden by showing the following: Barbara Akers was one of the most agressive supporters of the Union; her activity on behalf of the Union was known to Respondent; Respondent demonstrated a union animus in Freide's remarks during the Seminary Road campaign and his statement that he would never bargain with a union; and on February 20, 1980, Akers was fired notwithstanding her reputation as a competent hairdresser.

Since the General Counsel has met his responsibility for establishing a prima facie 8(a)(3) violation, the burden then shifts to Respondent to show that Akers would have been fired anyway even if she had not engaged in union activity. Not only was there a total failure of proof on Respondent's part, but the preponderance of the evidence indicates outright pretext. Terwilliger's statement that if "she [Akers] is five miniutes late she is gone" suggests that Respondent was just looking for an excuse to fire Akers. Also, the argument between Freide and Akers began over a matter of the utmost triviality—

[7] I have considered all accounts of the February 20, 1980, incident—General Counsel's witnesses Akers, Kyle, Davis and Responent's witnesses Freide, Terwilliger, Edwards (present employees of Respondent), and Hunt (former employee of Respondent)—and except for discrepancies about the tone and voice level of the participants, there were no major differences. The testimony of Becky Kyle that the incident ended with Terwilliger's remark, "there goes your union," was not corroborated by other testimony. Terwilliger testified that he said, "Good riddance" which in itself is an odd reaction of a manager to the departure of a competent employee, and suggests that management was happy to see a union "trouble-maker" leave.

Akers' interruptions of Denise Edwards' conversations—and it became heated only when Freide brought up Akers' alleged spreading of rumors and threats (clearly a reference to Akers' union activity), again indicating that what was really bothering Freide was Akers' union activity and not a petty squabble with a coworker. Moreover, even accepting Freide's statement that Akers was loud and rude during the January 20 argument, it is doubtful that a display of bad manners would have resulted in her firing if she had not been engaged in union activity. Good hairdressers are simply too hard to replace; comparable "scenes" in Respondent's shop have not been grounds for dismissal in the past; and it is reasonable to infer that but for Akers' union acitivity at most she would have been warned not to raise her voice again in the shop, and to step outside when asked to do so.

Respondent's reliance on Sullair P.T.O., Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 641 F.2d 500 (7th Cir. 1981), as justifying the dismissal of Akers is misplaced. There, an employee was warned against publicly directing profanities toward his employers. In response to this admonition during a companywide meeting, he proceeded to characterize management generally as "rotten m— f—g c—s," and the company controller as a "f—g poor manager." Moreover, the record showed that the employee had a history of such outbursts, that his use of especially ripe profanity even exceeded the "shop talk" standard of the plant, that his outburst disrupted a management-employee meeting, and that the employee acknowledged that he had been fired for insubordination. Similarly, Badische Corporation, 254 NLRB 1195 (1980), involved direct employee defiance of a specific order and a willingness to incur the risk of discipline, which had been clearly articulated in advance. In contrast, the brief flareup between Freide and Akers involved no more than perhaps an unseemly raising of voices which clearly had been tolerated on other occasions.

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On March 13, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Linton issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent filed a brief in support of the Decision of the Administrative Law Judge.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge only to the extent consistent herewith.

1. At the hearing, during the rebuttal stage of the proceeding, Donald Brower testified on behalf of the General Counsel concerning a conversation he had with Supervisor Foster just prior to the union election in 1979:

> The Witness [Brower]: I had talked to him [Foster]—or was talking to him before the union election, and we was talking about Dean Cinnamon and L. D. McDaniel and Jessie Smith and a couple of others that was batting heavy for the Union.
>
> And I made the remark that it was a damn shame that people like that had to be around, because I was nonunion, I was for the company and I was out there doing what I could for the company
> And he told me not to worry about it. He said, "I'll get rid of the fat bastards any time I want to."
> He said, "He'll make a slip . . . an error or something, and I'll get him."

At another point in his testimony Brower recounted another preelection conversation with Foster concerning McDaniel:

> The Witness [Brower]: I didn't like L. D. [McDaniel], and I told J. D. [Foster] I didn't like him. I was going to whip his ass the first chance I got.
>
> And he said, "Well, when you whip him, make sure that I don't see it," he said, "then I won't have to do nothing about it."
>
> And he said, "I wish you would whip him, as a matter of fact." He said, "I'd like to see somebody whip him."

259 NLRB No. 131

Respondent moved to strike the foregoing testimony as prejudicial, since the evidence should have been offered during the General Counsel's case-in-chief. Citing Acute Systems, Ltd. d/b/a McDonald's, 214 NLRB 879, 881 (1974), the Administrative Law Judge sustained Respondent's motion. The General Counsel has excepted to this ruling, and we find merit in his exception.

An administrative law judge has the discretion to exclude evidence improperly introduced on rebuttal, but his discretion should not be exercised to the detriment of a party's rights. In McDonald's, supra, the Administrative Law Judge declined to keep the record open to receive evidence that should have been subpenaed and introduced during the General Counsel's case-in-chief. She specifically observed, however, that the result reached in her Decision would not have been altered had the excluded evidence been considered. In the case before us, on the other hand, the Administrative Law Judge was at some pains to point out that the excluded evidence would have constituted strong support for the General Counsel's theory that L. D. McDaniel had been unlawfully discharged. In the absence of the excluded evidence, the Administrative Law Judge concluded that the General Counsel had failed to establish a prima facie case. Thus, it is clear that the excluded evidence was not only relevant but crucial to an informed legal assessment of Respondent's reasons for the discharge and therefore to the protection of McDaniel's statutory rights.

Under those circumstances, the preferable course would have been to admit the evidence, and we do so now.[1] We are aware, however, that the evidence was introduced at a stage in the proceeding that made it difficult for Respondent to counter effectively, assuming that it could have done so. Further, by sustaining Respondent's motion to strike, the Administrative Law Judge relieved Respondent of the responsibility of introducing its own evidence concerning the conversations between Foster and Brower. Respondent, of course, would be far more severely prejudiced by the lack of opportunity to present evidence to contradict Brower in this respect were we prepared to find, on the basis of the previously excluded testimony, that McDaniel was discriminatorily discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Under those circumstances, we would consider a remand necessary to permit

[1] We credit Brower's testimony based on the fact that the Administrative Law Judge found him to be a generally credible witness.

Respondent to introduce further evidence on the matter. As discussed at length in this Decision, however, we have upheld the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that the discharge of McDaniel was lawful.

2. The Administrative Law Judge found that Donald Brower was discharged for failing to conform to a valid work rule and concluded that his termination therefore did not constitute a violation of the Act. The General Counsel has excepted to this conclusion, and we agree with the General Counsel that Brower was first laid off and then discharged by Respondent in retaliation for his having expressed prounion sympathies and having complained about his wages.

The record establishes that, during the 1979 organizing campaign conducted at Respondent's facility by Teamsters Local 47, Brower, a new employee, was openly and vociferously opposed to the Union. The Union was defeated in an election held on November 2, 1979.[2]

Sometime in early 1980[3] Brower began to change his mind about the advisability of union representation at his employer's facility. His conversion was completed and his prounion attitude fixed when he learned from Supervisor Foster in March or April that over-the-road drivers would soon be paid an hourly wage instead of the mileage rates they had been receiving.[4] Brower's reaction to the information was to tell Foster that in the future he intended to support the Union.

About a month after Brower announced to Foster that he intended to campaign for the Union, Brower was sent to Respondent's El Paso terminal; while there he urged the El Paso drivers to support the Union and accused the Company, in frank and unflattering terms, of being unfair. El Paso Supervisor Smith learned of Brower's activities and telephoned Foster. When Brower returned from El Paso to Crowley, Foster told him to turn in his credit card, and that he was being placed on sick leave.[5] When Brower protested, Foster told him that he could not return to El Paso. Foster told Brower, "The management doesn't want you to come back to El Paso because you talk too much. You agitate."

The Administrative Law Judge found, and we agree, that Respondent laid off Donald Brower in retaliation for the remarks made to his fellow employees at El Paso, which were protected under the Act, and we therefore conclude that the layoff constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. We shall order a remedy accordingly.

Brower was laid off on May 23. He made numerous calls to Foster during the layoff to inquire about returning to work and was eventually recalled as a route driver[6] on June 11. He was discharged on June 15, ostensibly for failing to report an accident.

There is no doubt that Brower did in fact have a minor accident while backing a tractor-trailer into a loading bay at Vandervoort's Dairy, but there is considerable question whether Brower was aware that he had scratched the vehicle. The damage consisted of a shallow scratch 10-12 inches long on the left rear fender of the trailer, caused when Brower scraped against the wall of the unloading bay as he was backing the vehicle down the ramp. Two witnesses, both of whom testified at the hearing, saw the accident, but neither mentioned it to Brower himself. Under all the circumstances, we find it entirely possible, and even probable, that Brower, engaged in the noisy and delicate task of backing a large tractor-trailer rig down into an enclosed loading bay, did not realize that the side of the truck had slightly scraped a post. Thus, although we agree with the Administrative Law Judge that Brower did damage the truck, we draw no adverse inferences from the fact that he denied having done so when Foster confronted him with his failure to file a report of the accident or from the fact that he maintained his denial at the unfair labor practice hearing. In this connection we observe further that Brower had in the past reported all accidents to his vehicle and that Respondent therefore had no reason to assume that he would deliberately have failed to do so in this instance.

Based on the foregoing, we agree with the Administrative Law Judge that the General Counsel established a prima facie case of unlawful discharge. We disagree, however, that Respondent introduced sufficient credible evidence to rebut the General Counsel's case and demonstrate that it would have terminated Brower even absent his union activities. Respondent argues that it fired Brower pursuant to a valid and written work rule that required its employees to report all damage to vehicles, however minor. Respondent's rule, however, did not mandate termination for violations of the rule. To the contrary, according to Respondent's "Driver's Manual," which contains an explanation of work rules and regulations, "Any driver failing to report an accident could be subject to immediate discharge."[7] Elsewhere the manual provides that "[f]ailure to report an accident is cause for immediate dismissal."[8] Nowhere does the handbook suggest that the discipline imposed for failure to report an accident is not discretionary with management.[9] Since the rule on its face is discretionary, the burden was upon Respondent to demonstrate that termination was the discipline uniformly imposed for violation of the rule. The evidence here suggests the contrary; when Brower asked Foster how many other employees had been fired for failing to report an accident, Foster replied, "None. But I'm firing you."

[2] That election was subsequently set aside and a new election ordered. Associated Milk Producers, Inc., 255 NLRB 750 (1981).

[3] All dates are in 1980 hereafter unless otherwise indicated.

[4] The change in the wage structure reduced Brower's net income by almost 60 percent.

[5] The reference to medical leave was apparently Foster's peculiarly humorous response to Brower's remark that the Company's conduct made him sick.

[6] Brower had been an over-the-road driver prior to his layoff. The record is insufficient to enable us to determine whether Brower's June 11 recall was to a substantially equivalent position; therefore, insofar as such a determination is relevant to the issue of reinstatement and backpay, we leave it to the compliance stage of this proceeding.

Moreover, Respondent's defense is undermined by its past practice of imposing disproportionately harsh punishment upon union activists for infractions of its rules. In a prior case involving Respondent, the Administrative Law Judge concluded, and the Board affirmed, that employee Charles Tingle was unlawfully discharged in retaliation for his union activities, noting that "[t]he apparent unreasonableness of the punishment here carries an inference that the asserted reason for the discharge was pretext."[10] Clearly, Respondent's method of ridding itself of union adherents was to seize upon the infraction of a rule to justify their discharges. In Brower's case, as we noted earlier, it is not even clear that the rule requiring an employee to report all accidents was, in any but the most literal sense, violated at all. We therefore find that Respondent has failed to rebut the General Counsel's prima facie case by showing that the discharge would have been made in the absence of Brower's protected activity and conclude that Donald Brower was discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

3. In concluding that Respondent's discharge of L. D. McDaniel did not constitute a violation of the Act, the Administrative Law Judge found that the General Counsel had not established a prima facie case of unlawful motivation. While we agree with the Administrative Law Judge that Respondent did not discharge McDaniel unlawfully, we find that the General Counsel did establish a prima facie case, which Respondent successfully rebutted.

L. D. McDaniel was a longstanding union activist, and there is no question that at the time of his discharge on September 30 Respondent was acutely aware of his union sympathies. In addition to his organizational efforts, McDaniel testified against Respondent at an unfair labor practice hearing, and Respondent was reminded of that fact shortly before McDaniel's discharge when, on September 9, Administrative Law Judge Anderson issued his Decision in that proceeding, finding Respondent in violation of the Act. Moreover, the record demonstrates that Respondent harbored animus toward the Union and its supporters. We have concluded that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) in the discriminatory layoff and discharge of Donald Brower; in addition, the conversations between Foster and Brower in 1979 indicate union animus directed specifically against McDaniel.[11] The elements of protected activity on the part of the discharged employee, employer knowledge of the protected activity, and employer animus toward the Union, taken together, are sufficient to establish a prima facie case of unlawful discharge. Certainly those elements are present here. We therefore find that the General Counsel established prima facie that D. McDaniel was discharged in retaliation for union activity.

Respondent argues that McDaniel and another employee, Forrest Cottrell, were fired for fighting on the job, not for union activity. The record establishes that Respondent maintains an unwritten rule against fighting and that McDaniel was aware of the rule. McDaniel testified that he would have expected to be fired had he been the aggressor in the fight.[12] There is no question that McDaniel did engage in a fistfight and did hit his opponent with a wrench in the course of the conflict. Moreover, Cottrell was also fired, and the General Counsel introduced no evidence that Cottrell was a union supporter or that he was fired in an attempt to legitimize the unlawful discharge of McDaniel. Thus, we find that Respondent maintained a legitimate no-fighting rule which was evenly adminstered, and that McDaniel and Cottrell broke the rule and were terminated after an investigation of their conduct. We conclude that Respondent has introduced sufficient evidence to rebut the General Counsel's prima facie case of wrongful discharge. Accordingly, we conclude that the Administrative Law Judge properly dismissed that portion of the complaint alleging that the discharge of L. D. McDaniel violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

[9] The handbook also states:

> The heart of the Safe Driving Award Program is the careful determination of the preventability of each accident in which a driver is involved. This must be done in light of all the facts pertinent to the accident's occurrence. Unearthing of these facts is sometimes difficult in practice but it can be made easier by training drivers to report the accidents in which they are involved, completely and accurately.

Complete investigation by management is equally necessary. In finding Brower's discharge legitimate, the Administrative Law Judge determined that termination was not a disproportionate discipline in light of the importance of the rule to Respondent's operation. To the extent that the Administrative Law Judge advanced reasons for Respondent's reporting rule other than that given by Respondent, we disavow his findings. Insofar as such justification may be necessary to rebut an inference of unlawful motive, the burden is upon Respondent, not upon the Administrative Law Judge, to advance reasons for its rules and to justify imposition of seemingly disproportionate discipline.

[10] Associated Milk Producers, Inc., supra.

[11] We find, however, that the probative value of these conversations is diminished by time, since they occurred nearly a year before McDaniel's termination.

[12] McDaniel testified that he struck the first blow but maintained that it was in self-defense, as Cottrell was approaching in a menacing fashion.

THE REMEDY

ASSOCIATED MILK PRODUCERS, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. LINTON, Administrative Law Judge: These consolidated cases were heard before me in Fort Worth, Texas, on January 8, 1981, pursuant to a consolidated complaint, dated November 6, 1980, issued by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board through the Acting Regional Director for Region 16 of the Board. The consolidated complaint is based on charges filed by Donald L. Brower, an individual (Brower), and L. D. McDaniel, an individual (McDaniel), against Associated Milk Producers, Inc. (Respondent or AMPI herein).

In the consolidated complaint, the General Counsel alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, herein called the Act, by unlawfully interrogating an employee around mid-March 1980; Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by laying off Brower on May 21, 1980, and discharging him on June 15, 1980; and Section 8(a)(3) and (4) of the Act by discharging McDaniel on September 30, 1980.[1]

By its answer, Respondent admits certain allegations, but denies that it has violated the Act in any manner.

Upon the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by counsel for the General Counsel[2] and Respondent, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a Kansas corporation headquartered in San Antonio, Texas, operates as a distributor of dairy milk from various locations in Texas. Its former facility at Crowley, Texas, now located at Blue Mound, Texas, is the operation involved herein. During the past 12 months, Respondent had gross sales in excess of $500,000, and purchased and received at its Texas locations goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Texas. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

---

[1] All dates shown are for 1980 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] I am constrained to observe that the General Counsel's brief contains certain gross inaccuracies. For example, at br. p. 4 the General Counsel states that El Paso location Supervisor Bob Smith was aware of Brower's "change of sentiments from supporting Respondent in the union organizational campaign to supporting the Union." Not only is none of the cited pages support for the assertion, but the following appears in the cross-examination of Smith by the General Counsel:

> Q. That you—when he was talking against the company and for the union—
> A. He didn't say whether or not he was for the union at that time. And I didn't say that. [Emphasis supplied.]

At br. p. 7 the General Counsel asserts that Crowley Supervisor J. D. Foster "testified that he had never fired anyone before for fighting and hired an employee named Webber who was known to have been a frequent fighter while in the employ of Respondent. In rebuttal, the General Counsel's witness, Brower, testified that he had had a conversation with Foster in which Foster asked Brower to whip McDaniel but not to let Foster see it. The surface question related to whether Foster had rehired Webber, for Foster had become a supervisor after Webber had earlier left. During the General Counsel's cross-examination of Foster, the latter stated:

> Q. All right, sir. But you hired him [Webber] anyway?
> A. I didn't rehire him. He was hired up at the Sanger location and then later transferred, when we put the Crowley location together and the Blue Mound location together, I inherited that location up there.

With respect to the rebuttal testimony that Foster allegedly encouraged Brower to whip McDaniel, that evidence was stricken when I sustained Respondent's motion to strike on the basis that it was not proper rebuttal. At the General Counsel's request that the evidence be made an offer of proof, I granted such motion and rejected the offer. To the extent that the General Counsel's reference to this rejected evidence in his brief is an unarticulated motion that I reverse my ruling, I decline to do so and adhere to my rulings at the hearing.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that Chauffeurs, Teamsters, and Helpers Local 47, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Union or Local 47 herein) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

1. Introduction

The principal issues involved in this consolidated case are whether Respondent laid off Donald L. Brower on May 21, 1980, and fired him on June 15 because of his support of Union (or, as Respondent asserts, for failing to report an accident), and whether it fired L. D. McDaniel on September 30 for the same reason (or, as Respondent asserts, for engaging in a fight with another driver) plus the additional reason that he testified against Respondent on April 22 before Administrative Law Judge Clifford H. Anderson in a Board proceeding.

At the time of their discharges by Respondent, Brower had been employed only since August 1979 as a transportation (over-the-road) driver, whereas McDaniel had been employed as a route (local pickup) driver for nearly 12 years.

Complaint paragraph 7 (in conjunction with par. 14) alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by Crowley Terminal Manager J. D. Foster's conduct, "since on or about mid March," of orally "interrogating one of its employees concerning such employee's union preferences and desires."

At the close of evidence, Respondent moved that I dismiss complaint paragraph 7 on the basis that no evidence was adduced in support of it. (the General Counsel opposed the motion.) I denied the motion then on the ground that a reading of the record might disclose some evidence in support of the allegation even though I could recall none. In his brief, counsel for the General Counsel "concedes that there is insufficient evidence to warrant a finding of oral interrogation as alleged in paragraph 7 . . . ." (Br. p. 2.) Although the General Counsel moves to withdraw the oral interrogation, he seeks to retain the generalized phrase of interference, restraint, and coercion in paragraph 7 for "derivative 8(1)" purposes. As complaint paragraph 14 (conclusionary 8(a)(1) allegation) may serve the derivative purpose, I now grant Respondent's motion to dismiss complaint paragraph 7 in its entirety on the ground there is no record evidence to support such allegation.

2. Administrative Law Judge Anderson's Decision

As Administrative Law Judge Clifford H. Anderson outlined in his September 9, 1980, Decision[3] involving Respondent's same facility,[4] an election was held among Respondent's approximately 34 Crowley employees on November 2, 1979. The Union, apparently losing the election, filed objections which were consolidated for hearing with a complaint which alleged, among other matters, that on October 20, 1979, Respondent discharged driver Charles Tingle because of his support of the Union. Among other unfair labor practice findings, Administrative Law Judge Anderson found that Tingle's discharge violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act as alleged. As previously noted herein, because Administrative Law Judge Anderson's Decision is not final, I do not rely on his findings of animus or unfair labor practices by Respondent.

For background purposes only, I take note of certain factual matters recited in the Decision. Thus, I note that L. D. McDaniel[5] figured prominently as a union supporter and the General Counsel's witness in the case before Administrative Law Judge Anderson. The parties stipulated here that McDaniel was a card solicitor and that he testified in the prior case. Moreover, it appears McDaniel also served as the Union's election observer and attended the preelection conference. He testified against Respondent's interests at the April 22 hearing.

B. Donald L. Brower's Layoff and Discharge

1. Brower's layoff

It is undisputed that in the weeks between his August 1979 hiring and the November 2, 1979, election, Brower was outspoken against the Union. There is a dispute concerning whether Respondent became aware that Brower switched his position to support of the Union in the early spring of 1980. The subject matter of this question leads directly to Brower's layoff about May 23.

Crowley-Blue Mound terminal Manager J. D. Foster testified that on April 21, General Manager Sonny Pride told him in Arlington, Texas, that everyone would convert to an hourly pay basis and that he could give his employees 1 or 2 weeks notice.[6] Shortly after receiving this information, Foster told Brower (and presumably the other seven transportation drivers) that the pay conversion would be effective on May 4.

Brower testified that beginning around January-February he changed his position regarding the Union. According to Brower, around March or April 25 he learned from Foster that the transportation drivers were to be converted from a mileage to an hourly pay rate of $4.62. Brower protested, and informed Foster that he definitely would do everything "I could to campaign the union in and get a union in the next time we voted, that I wasn't going to try to swing it the other way for them after what he had done to us." He said Foster displayed a "go-to-hell" look or attitude indicating it did not matter to him. Foster apparently said nothing. In his testimony on this point, Brower added that Foster had said (at an earlier time, apparently) that he could get rid of anyone he wanted to, when he wanted to, union or not, whenever he felt like it.[7] Foster did not address the earlier conversation in his testimony, and denied speaking with Brower or any employee about the Union after the April hearing.[8]

[3] As requested by the General Counsel at the instant hearing, I take official notice of Administrative Law Judge Anderson's Decision. As the Decision does not become final until adopted or modified by the Board, I do not rely here on the unfair labor practices found by Administrative Law Judge Anderson.

[4] At the time of the April 22, 1980, hearing before Administrative Law Judge Anderson in consolidated Cases 16-CA-8782 and 16-RC-8022, the facility was located in Crowley, Texas. Respondent moved its Crowley terminal to Blue Mound, Texas, around late May 1980. Crowley is a short distance south of Fort Worth, Texas, and Blue Mound is just north of Fort Worth. Thus, Respondent combined its Crowley and Blue Mound operations into a single terminal.

[5] One of the two alleged discriminatees herein.

[6] Route drivers, such as McDaniel, already were hourly paid. Transportation (over-the-road) drivers, such as Brower, were paid by the mile. Brower testified without contradiction that the pay change reduced his take-home pay by about 60 percent. Foster testified that as of on or about May 4 at the Crowley location there were some eight transportation drivers, 28 hourly paid route drivers, and 4 hourly paid mechanics.

About a month after Brower told Foster of his intentions to support Local 47, Brower had occasion to make a trip to Respondent's El Paso terminal. According to Brower, he urged the drivers there to support the Union because the drivers were not being paid as much as AMPI claimed they were; that Crowley drivers were not being paid for bunk time; and that the drivers should select Local 47 in the next vote and shut AMPI down until it treated the drivers fairly. He admittedly made the urging in language unflattering to Respondent, including cursing AMPI and Foster. He denied telling El Paso Location Supervisor (or Terminal Manager) Bob Smith that he was sick of Respondent copulating the drivers around, and denied calling Respondent a copulating "son-of-a-bitch" for treating him unfairly, and stated that he knew better than to do so because Smith repeats what he hears. He said he spoke with Smith only generally about the trip there.

El Paso Location Supervisor Smith testified that, on May 21, Brower came into his El Paso office. When Smith asked him how he was doing, Brower replied, in latrine terminology, that he was not worth "a scato." Brower reportedly said that AMPI wanted him to run for nothing and that AMPI was not worth a defecation. Brower then began to curse Foster and Sonny Pride, describing them as "god-damn" maternal fornicators.[9] Smith responded, "In other words, if anybody needs to know anything about AMPI, all they've got to do is ask you?" Brower replied in the affirmative.

Smith testified that a little while later he encountered Brower in the drivers' room where Brower told him he was going to write a letter to President Carter and let him know what a sorry company AMPI was. Smith did not describe what response, if any, he gave. He testified that he told the foreman to get Brower loaded as soon as possible. Smith then called Foster at Crowley, reported Brower's remarks, and stated that he did not want Brower sent to El Paso again. Smith testified that Brower said nothing about the Union on this occasion, and that the only time Brower had ever mentioned Local 47 to him was around April when he said he was "not for the union."

Brower testified that, on his return to Crowley, Terminal Manager Foster told him to turn in his credit card, that Foster was sending a new driver to El Paso, and that Brower was going on sick leave. When Brower protested that he was not sick, Foster stated that Brower had said he was sick and that he was being placed on sick leave. Brower turned over the credit card and went home.

Explaining the reference about being sick, Brower testified that he had told Foster he was sick of getting fornicated around by AMPI. Foster denied that Respondent was mistreating the drivers. According to Brower, Foster told him that he could not return to El Paso because:

> The management doesn't want you to come back to El Paso because you talk too much. You agitate.

Although it is not entirely clear from Brower's testimony that all of the foregoing occurred in the same conversation, it seems clear that he was describing either a single conversation or two conversations held close in time.[10]

Terminal Manager Foster testified that on May 23, 1980, he told Brower that he could not let him return to El Paso, and as Foster knew that Brower did not desire to drive a route there was no work for him since there was no transporting for Brower to do. Foster therefore told Brower to go home and wait, that perhaps something would develop. He testified that at the time, and for the previous 3 months, the only transporting being done was between Crowley and El Paso (some 600 miles west of Crowley). Foster denied that Brower ever told him he was going to campaign to get the Union in at AMPI, and, on cross-examination, denied knowing that Brower's sentiments had switched to support of the Union as of the May 1980 telephone report from El Paso terminal Manager Bob Smith.[11]

[7] According to Brower, until he changed his position on Local 47, Foster could freely discuss union issues with Brower. Thereafter, Foster would remark, "I don't want to talk about it" if Brower brought up the subject.

[8] Brower had a tendency to date admitted events at an earlier time than did Foster. Thus, while it is undisputed that Brower received a 1-week suspension for having an unauthorized person in his truck, Brower placed the date in December 1979 whereas Foster dated the event in February. While I credit Brower concerning the undisputed conversation reported above, it is likely the conversation occurred in late April after Foster had been told himself about the pay conversion by General Manager Pride.

[9] During his earlier cross-examination, Brower denied these assertions and testified that he did not know Pride. Pride's exact position in the corporate hierachy is unknown, notwithstanding Smith's testimony that Foster reports to Pride. Such fact is not at all clear from the pleadings or the record. In any event, Pride apparently did not have an office at Crowley. Thus, I note that Assistant Transportation Manager McAdams testified that his own office is located at the Dallas-Fort Worth Division's headquarters in Arlington. Brower did not clarify whether he meant that by not knowing Pride he had never heard that Sonny Pride was general manager (or a managerial superior of Foster). Respondent did not present any evidence showing that it informs drivers of the names and titles of management located away from the terminals where the drivers are assigned.

[10] Brower's testimony was presented in a rambling and confusing fashion at times.

[11] I credit Brower over Foster. Not only did the former testify in a more believable fashion, his story is more consistent with the undisputed facts, particularly in reference to the pay system change for the transportation drivers. Moreover, I note that on cross-examination Foster concedes that he became aware through gossip that Brower, who was "mad as a hornet," was no longer supporting AMPI against the Union.

2. Brower's discharge

Following his May 23 layoff, Brower testified that he telephoned Foster numerous times in an unsuccessful effort to obtain work. Finally, around June 11, he received a registered letter (not offered in evidence) from Foster advising him to report for work as a route driver picking up milk at farmers' dairies. Brower so reported and worked 3 days at $4.62 per hour until his discharge on June 15 at the Blue Mound terminal.

Foster testified that he learned on June 13 from route driver Calvin Worley that Brower had bumped his vehicle against a wall while backing into Vandervoort's Dairy facility in Fort Worth, Texas. On Sunday, June 15, when Brower came to the Blue Mound terminal, Foster asked him whether he had failed to report an accident. Brower replied in the negative. Foster and Brower then went to look at the tank trailer and observed where it had been dented slightly and skinned.[12]

Part VII of Respondent's driver's manual (Resp. Exh. 1) covers the subject of accidents. Paragraph 2, p. 12, (Resp. Exh. 1) instructs drivers as follows:

> Every accident is to be reported to AMPI. Gather all possible information—before leaving the scene of an accident. Failure to report an accident is cause for immediate dismissal.

Foster testified that the above rule has been discussed in safety meetings with drivers and that copies of the manual have been distributed at such meetings and to all new drivers.[13] When Brower persisted in denying responsibility for the bump scratch, Foster in effect suspended him and told Brower he would let him know the outcome the following day. The next morning Foster telephoned attorney Andrew who advised him that Brower be terminated. Foster testified he thereafter fired Brower for not reporting the accident and for failing to fill out an accident report.

Brower testified that on June 15, in the Blue Mound office, Foster told him he had a report that Brower had been engaged in an accident with his truck. Brower denied such. Foster said he had two witnesses that it was true, and that "I'm going to have to fire you." They then went to the trailer and inspected the scratch-dent on the trailer skirt. According to Brower, whom I credit, Foster put his finger on the 10-12 inch scratch and said "There it is right here." Foster pointed to the mark and said, "I'm firing you for doing this." Brower said he did not do it, but even if he had it was nothing to fire him for. He then asked Foster how many people he had ever fired for such a matter. Foster replied, "None. But I'm firing you."

When Brower asked Foster who the two witnesses were, Foster replied, "I don't have to tell you a damn thing. I'll let my lawyers take care of that. You're fired."

At the hearing, Calvin Worley, formerly employed by AMPI (as a route driver), testified on behalf of Respondent that on June 13 at Vandervoort's Dairy he heard a noise, walked out to the dock area, and observed that Brower had the left rear of his tank trailer (at the point of the scratch in issue) up against the wall.

On June 13, Carl Stine was employed by Vandervoort's as a raw milk receiver. On that date he observed Brower back into the unloading hole (a slant-down at the unloading dock). Brower's initial attempt to back in was out of alignment, and on the second attempt Brower hit the building with the left rear of the tank trailer. Stine was called as a witness by Respondent.

Called as a witness for the General Counsel, M. E. Brawley testified that on June 13 he, as garage foreman for Vandervoort's Dairy, was situated across the street and observed Brower back into the "hole" for unloading. Brawley concedes that the left side of the truck was blocked from his field of view and that the vehicle could have hit something and Brawley would not have known it. On the other hand, it seems that Brawley would have noticed if Brower's movement had halted at the entrance to the unloading ramp (hole), for the import of the testimony of Worley and Stine is that Brower got hung up at the entrance post.[14] Indeed, Worley testified that he assisted (apparently by hollering instructions, directions, and observations) Brower in extricating his tanker from its predicament.

I credit Worley and Stine. While I do not discredit Brawley, I note that his view was from across the street whereas Worley and Stine were at the spot. Moreover, Brawley concedes Brower could have made an earlier attempt (and, presumably, bumped into the entrance guard post then). Accordingly, I find that Brower backed into the steel entrance post as described by Worley[15] and Stine.

3. The wage-hour complaint

In the April conversation between Brower and Foster, the latter told Brower of the pay system change and Brower became "mad as a hornet" and told Foster thereafter that he would seek to get the Union in at AMPI.[16]

[12] Color photographs taken by Brower of the skin marks are in evidence as G.C. Exhs. 2, 3, and 4. Brower described the mark as being a scratch about 10–12 inches long with the right end of the scratch having an indentation as if made with a screwdriver.

[13] Assistant Transportation Manager James McAdams, whose office is in Arlington, Texas, testified that AMPI's policy is that drivers are to report all accidents which result in "any damage." He further testified that a Comanche, Texas, driver (employed in the Dallas-Fort Worth division of AMPI) was fired in March 1980 for failure to file an accident report. McAdams did not describe the nature of the accident. Brower, in fact, testified that he knew AMPI has a rule requiring drivers to report any accident, no matter how small. Indeed, he has filed two accident reports since becoming an employee of AMPI. The first accident occurred on September 4, 1979, in Dallas and involved a similar incident to the event in question here. The estimated amount of damage shown on p. 1 of Resp. Exh. 2 is the amount of $1,500. The second accident occurred December 15, 1979, in Dallas and involved an estimate of no damage to API's truck when a car skidded into it. Respondent's accident review committee charged the first accident against Brower as being "preventable," but found the second accident to be "non-preventable." (G.C. Exhs. 9 and 10.)

[14] The diagram (Resp. Exh. 8) drawn by Stine clearly depicts such fact.

[15] While the fact that Worley volunteered the accident information to Foster suggests a possible bias on his part, no further evidence was adduced, such as that he may have been openly antiunion or that he and Brower were unfriendly, to call for such a finding.

[16] I credit Brower over Foster. I observed Brower to be more sincere and straightforward even though he dated events incorrectly.

It appears that around that time, apparently shortly after the conversation, Brower complained to the Department of Transportation and the wage-hour division of the United States Department of Labor regarding the change in the pay basis from mileage to hourly for the over-the-road drivers. Brower testified he and one other driver signed a formal complaint against Respondent with the wage-hour division.

Called as a witness by Respondent, Roy W. Watkins testified that he has been a compliance officer for the wage-hour division for approximately 14 years. He testified that he began an investigation of wage-hour matters at Respondent's Stephenville, Texas, terminal around January-February 1980. Following completion of a backpay settlement of that investigation around mid-May, Watkins asked Attorney Andrew to look at the Crowley terminal, ascertain whether there were similar violations there, and, if so, to indicate whether he was willing to settle them on the same basis as had been done at Stephenville. Attorney Andrew agreed, and on July 15 he sent Watkins a letter (Resp. Exh. 7) suggesting that Respondent pay overtime compensation to 20 employees. Brower was 1 of the 20, and the figures of $1,865.31 beside his name is nearly double that of the next highest figure of $1,036.89.

On the ground that departmental regulations made such information confidential, Watkins declined to answer questions concerning who had filed a complaint and even whether a formal complaint had been filed regarding the Crowley terminal. Watkins did testify that the first mention of Brower's name between him and Andrew was in Andrew's July 15 letter to Watkins. Moreover, he testified that no letter was sent prior to that time from his office to Attorney Andrew or to Respondent naming Brower in any way.

As already noted, Brower testified he filed a formal complaint with the wage-hour division. There is no record evidence disproving this assertion. Brower, I note, has a tendency to refer to Federal agencies in an indiscriminate manner, and in so doing his testimony becomes rambling and confusing. As an example of this disorderly portion of Brower's testimony, he stated that, on the day Foster fired him, Foster said he had received a letter from the "Wage and Hour and the Labor Board, and that my name was the only name that showed up on it." No such letter was offered in evidence.[17] When then asked to restate the reference to the Board, he stated that such came in when he told Foster he would go to the Board and Foster replied he did not care.

Another apparent inaccuracy is Brower's testimony that a wage-hour division representative told him the agency would have to tell Respondent that Brower was the person filing a complaint against the company. According to Watkins' undisputed testimony, such a disclosure (except through mistake) would be prohibited by departmental regulations.[18]

Despite Brower's disorderly and inaccurate, at times, testimony on the foregoing subject, I find that Brower complained (either orally or in writing) to the wage-hour division following his April conversation with Foster.[19] Although Foster denied (in answer to leading questions) that Brower ever told him he had filed a wage-hour complaint, and asserted that he was unaware of the department's investigation, he conceded on recross-examination that he had heard talk of charges having been filed with the wage-hour division but that "I hadn't been told directly."

4. Analysis and conclusions

Notwithstanding Brower's disorganized and, at times, inaccurate testimony regarding the Federal agencies, I find that he was a more believable witness than Terminal Managers Foster and Smith regarding their conversations. Moreover, Brower's version of these conversations in fact is internally consistent and also consistent with the critical, and undisputed, fact that, around late April 1980, Foster told Brower that the transportation (over-the-road) drivers would switch to an hourly pay basis on May 4. That information converted formerly pro-AMPI Brower into a "mad hornet" who launched a flurry of verbal attacks upon AMPI. Respondent countered by laying Brower off for his protected El Paso remarks, and thereafter discharged him in part for what I find to be an unlawfully motivated reason.

With respect to the unlawful motivation for the discharge, I note that Foster's remark to Brower, in response to how many others he had fired for similar conduct, "None, but I'm firing you," is suggestive of animus. Moreover, the 10-12-inch scratch with indentation obviously constituted far less damage than the "dented tank" (Resp. Exh. 2, p. 2) caused by Brower when he hit a column post and a steel cabinet while backing into a bay at the Oak Farms Dairy in Dallas on September 4, 1979, in an almost identical accident. The $1,500 repair estimate for the Oak Farms accident reflects the fact that the tank was dented. In our situation, it was not the tank which was scratched, but the fender skirt—and the scratch, while deeper, just added to the other scrapes appearing on the skirt as shown in the color photographs in evidence.

More significantly, when Brower hit the post at the Oak Farms Dairy in Dallas on September 4, 1979, he was openly favoring AMPI against Local 47. At that time Foster told Brower, "Well, it's no big deal. It happens. Make an accident report, and we'll take care of it."[20] When Brower several months later switched his support to the Union, Foster gave him the "cold shoulder."

[17] In fact, later in his testimony, Brower asserts that Foster had told him on an earlier occasion of receiving a wage-hour letter with Brower's name on it. While I do not overlook the possibility that Foster was jousting with Brower by relying on information he possibly received from his superiors in mid-May, I do not find such to be the case in the absence of any evidence to that effect.

[18] No citation of a specific regulation was given. There is some question whether a published regulation exists in light of 46 Fed. Reg. 7392 (January 23, 1981), wherein the Secretary of Labor proposed a rule governing situations where department employees are subpenaed to testify. Compare Sec. 102.118 of the Board's Rules and Regulations.

[19] Brower's complaint presumably related to the pay system switch. I find it immaterial whether Brower's complaint is related to the subsequent backpay payment he and others received at Crowley-Blue Mound.

[20] Foster did not contradict this evidence when he testified.

Finally, I note that Foster told Brower just prior to the November 2, 1979, election that he could get rid of anybody, union or not, and that he "would get rid of the agitators when the time comes."[21] This prophetic utterance became more personal to Brower on May 23 when Foster told him, "You talk too much. You agitate." The prophesy, I find, became a fulfilled reality for Brower on June 15 when Foster fired Brower.

Accordingly, I find that the General Counsel established a prima facie case that Respondent, as alleged, violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by laying off Donald L. Brower on or about May 23, 1980, until on or about June 11, 1980, and by discharging him on or about June 15, 1980.

Under Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), once the General Counsel has established that an employee's protected activities were a motivating reason for the discharge, the burden shifts to respondent to establish that it would have discharged the employee notwithstanding such protected activities. In this case it appears, and I find, that Respondent carried its burden. This is so even though Crowley Terminal Manager Foster told Brower that the September 1979 $1,500 damage to the tank part of the trailer (where the milk is contained) was "no big deal" when Brower was antiunion, yet 9 months later, with Brower now openly prounion, a scratch on the fender skirt had suddenly become a matter of significance.

Foster testified that he fired Brower for failing to report an accident and failing to submit an accident report. I do not credit such testimony in its import that Brower's union activities were not one reason for the discharge. On the other hand, in the absence of disparity evidence, and in light of Brower's own testimony that any accident, no matter how small, is to be reported, I conclude that one reason for the discharge was Brower's failure to report the incident. Thus, I deem this to be a "mixed motive" case rather than a case of discharge on a "pretext" (i.e., this is not a case where the reason advanced is not at all why the employee was discharged but in fact is seized upon only as a pretext) under the Wright Line guidelines. The General Counsel offered no evidence of disparity regarding application of the requirement to report all accidents, and I cannot say that discharge for violating the reporting rule is so grossly disproportionate in relation to the need to maintain the integrity of the rule as to indicate that such discipline would have been lesser, or not imposed at all, in other circumstances.

It must be remembered that Brower did in fact file a report regarding the September 1979 accident. Clearly the integrity of the accident reporting rule is of supreme importance to Respondent. If failures to report seemingly insignificant accidents are sanctioned, drivers may get to the point of not reporting an event resulting in a suit for big damages. Early knowledge is important for notifying the insurance carrier, interviewing witnesses, and the like. Aside from potential damage claims, good customer relations (where a customer's property is damaged) is another obvious reason Respondent would seek to maintain the integrity of its rule.[22]

In light of the foregoing, I shall dismiss the complaint with respect to Donald L. Brower.

C. L. D. McDaniel's Discharge

As earlier noted, the General Counsel alleges that Respondent discharged L. D. McDaniel on or about September 30, 1980, because of his activities on behalf of the Union and because he testified under the Act before Administrative Law Judge Anderson. McDaniel, a route driver, had been employed by AMPI for nearly 12 years at the time of his discharge.

Crowley-Blue Mound Transportation Supervisor J. D. Foster testified that he discharged McDaniel, and fellow driver Forrest Cottrell, on September 30 for fighting on the job 9 days earlier at Super Brand Dairy.[23] That McDaniel and Cottrell engaged in a brief fist fight on such occasion is undisputed.[24] Cottrell did not testify. McDaniel, who had never even been reprimanded previously, testified that he would have expected to have been discharged had he been the aggressor, but that he should not have been discharged since he acted in self-defense. I largely credit McDaniel, on the basis of his credible testimony, regarding the nature of the fight, although I find that in the fight he dealt Cottrell a glancing blow on the hip with a wrench.

There is no other record evidence of a fight between employees on the job.[25] Although Foster testified that AMPI has no written rule prohibiting fighting, he has told the drivers at safety meetings that they will be discharged if they get in a fight on company time. Foster further testified that he is unaware of any fights by Crowley employees since he has been manager, and, therefore, he has not discharged anyone else for fighting. James McAdams, assistant transportation manager from AMPI's Arlington office, testified that he attended most of the safety meetings held at Crowley, but that he did not recall any reference to fighting at such meetings.[26]

[21] Brower was speaking to Foster about the union activities of L. D. McDaniel (an alleged discriminatee herein) and Dean Cinnamon.

[22] Although Respondent has not cited these examples as some of the reasons for its rule, I cannot overlook the fact that the record compels a finding that Respondent expects the rule to be followed strictly. Commonsense supplies the above examples of why Respondent would want to maintain the integrity of its rule.

[23] The complaint makes no allegation regarding Cottrell, such as on a theory that Cottrell was discharged in order to give an air of legitimacy to McDaniel's discharge. Driver Cottrell had been employed by AMPI less than 1 year.

[24] Cottrell, scheduled to unload ahead of McDaniel, was late in arriving. Consequently, McDaniel proceeded to unload upon the suggestion of the dairy's attendant. On arriving during McDaniel's unloading, Cottrell became upset. He first angrily asked McDaniel why he was unloading first. The second time he approached McDaniel a fight ensued. McDaniel testified he thought he was about to be attacked when Cottrell approached him a second time. McDaniel pushed Cottrell back and, in the ensuing fight, each hit the other in the mouth. A witness, driver Dean Cinnamon, testified that McDaniel hit Cottrell a glancing blow on the hip with a large wrench. The fighters wore down quickly, and the fight ended. Foster testified he learned about the fight from another driver a few days after it occurred. McDaniel and Cottrell were suspended while Foster investigated the matter.

[25] There is a sketchy hearsay reference to driver Don Webber having a fight with a dairyman about 10 years previously. Whatever the actual facts regarding Webber's altercation, it predated Foster's becoming manager of the Crowley terminal in August 1975.

During the rebuttal stage, Donald L. Brower was permitted to testify, subject to a motion to strike, that before the election he (being antiunion at the time) did not like McDaniel (a prounion driver) and was going to whip him at the first opportunity. Foster replied that he wished Brower would do so, but:

> Well, when you whip him, make sure that I don't see it because I'll have to fire you if I see it. If I don't see it then I won't have to do nothing about it.

I sustained Respondent's objection and motion to strike the foregoing on the basis that such evidence could have been offered during the General Counsel's case-in-chief and therefore was not proper rebuttal.[27] It is clear that such evidence, if admitted and credited,[28] would have constituted strong support for McDaniel's case since it reflects (1) animus toward McDaniel; (2) a willingness to condone, and even encourage, fighting so long as it is directed toward beating of a union supporter; and (3) only fighting personally observed by Foster would subject the fighters to the penalty of discharge.

In the absence of disparity evidence, or testimony such as that excluded during rebuttal, I am compelled to conclude that the General Counsel has failed to establish a prima facie case that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) by discharging McDaniel on September 30, 1980. Accordingly, I shall dismiss that portion of the complaint.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. Respondent has not committed any of the unfair labor practices alleged in the consolidated complaint.

January 13, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On August 17, 1981, Administrative Law Judge George Christensen issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, both the Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs[1] and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.[4]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, San Diego County Association for the Retarded, San Diego, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modfied:

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1:

"1. Cease and desist from:

"(a) Disciplining its employees for engaging in a strike for the purpose of securing satisfactory resolution of their work-related grievances.

"(b) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act."

2. Substitute the following for paragraphs 2(a) and (b) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly:

"(a) Offer Robert Acosta, James Dunkin, David Gilmore, Aiko Hinojosa, Karen Peckell, Therese Sullivan, Genevieve West, and Warren Werwage immediate reinstatement to their former positions, if necessary terminating their replacements, or, if such positions no longer exists, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings resulting from the discrimination practiced against them, in the manner described in 'The Remedy' section of this Decision."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge you for engaging in a strike for the purpose of causing us to favorably resolve your work-related grievances (grievances over your rates of pay, wages, hours, or working conditions).

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Robert Acosta, James Dunkin, David Gilmore, Aiko Hinojosa, Karen Pickell, Therese Sullivan, Genvieve West, and Warren Werwage reinstatement to their former positions, if necessary terminating their replacements, or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

WE WILL make Acosta, Dunkin, Gilmore, Hinojosa, Pickell, Sullivan, West, and Werwage whole for any losses in wages or benefits they suffered by virtue of our discharging them for engaging in a strike to cause us to favorably resolve their work-related grievances, with interest.

[1] The Respondent's request for oral argument is denied because, in our opinion, the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately set forth the issues and positions of the parties.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[3] In accordance with his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth therein.

[4] We find the Respondent's unlawful conduct in discharging eight employees for engaging in a strike is so egregious as to demonstrate a disregard for its employees' fundamental statutory rights. We find it necessary, therefore, to order the Respondent to cease and desist from "in any other manner" interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their protected Section 7 rights. Hickmott Foods, Inc., 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

259 NLRB No. 136

SAN DIEGO COUNTY ASSOCIATION FOR THE RETARDED

DECISION

GEORGE CHRISTENSEN, Administrative Law Judge: On November 24–25, 1980,[1] I conducted a hearing at San Diego, California, to try issues raised by a complaint issued on July 18 and amended on August 7, based upon a charge filed on June 9 and amended on July 17.

The amended complaint alleges that San Diego County Association for the Retarded (herein called Association) violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (Act), by discharging eight employees because they engaged in protected concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid and protection.

The Association concedes it discharged the eight, but contends that the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board either does not or should not be extended to its operations and denies the eight employees were discharged for engaging in activities protected by the Act, asserting the eight were discharged for engaging in unlawful, unprotected activities.

The issues are whether the Board has jurisdiction over the Association; if so, whether it should exercise that jurisdiction; and if so, whether the eight discharges were violative of the Act.

The parties appeared by counsel at the hearing and were afforded full opportunity to adduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue, and to file briefs. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and the Association.

Based on my review of the entire record, observation of the witnesses, perusal of the briefs, analysis and research, I enter the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The amended complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find at all pertinent times the Association was a nonprofit California corporation engaged in the business of educating and training mentally retarded children and adults; that it operated four facilities in San Diego County, California, including a facility known as the Arrow Center (herein called the Center) at 3035 G Street, San Diego, California; and that during the year 1979 it received gross revenues in excess of $250,000 from its operations, grants in excess of $5,000 from the United States Department of Labor, and purchased and received goods and products from outside California valued in excess of $5,000.

On the basis of the foregoing, I find and conclude that at all pertinent times the Association was an employer engaged in commerce in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act. I further find and conclude, in view of the nature, substantiality, and scope of the acts alleged in the complaint as violative of the Act and their actual or potential effect on interstate commerce, it effectuates the purposes of the Act to exercise jurisdiction in this case.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Center's Operations

At times pertinent the Center employed approximately 20 teachers or instructors and aides in its activities department and 12 supervisors, instructors, and aides in its workshops department for the purpose of training and instructing about 185 students ranging between 22 and 60 years of age, with IQ's of between 20 through 70, with most students at the lower end of that range. Charles E. Covell was the director of the Center and in overall charge of its operations. Directly under Covell and in charge of the activities department was Dorothy Cummings, activities supervisor.[2]

Included among the teachers or instructors and aides in activities in late April were Robert Acosta, James Dunkin, Julie Fish, David Gilmore, Maureen Hillman, Aiko Hinojosa, Karen Pickell, Ruri Pierre, Therese Sullivan, Genvieve West, and Warren Werwage.[3]

B. The Concerted Activities and the Discharges

In late April, Hinojosa was teaching a class of approximately 20 students in Basic Education II, assisted by two aides. Several days prior to Friday, April 25, Covell gave his written approval to Hinojosa's proposal for her and another class to take a field trip to the zoo on April 25. Following that approval, Hinojosa informed her class of the scheduled trip and they discussed what they would see and do during the trip.

About 2 p.m. on April 24, Cummings informed Hinojosa that the field trip was canceled since Covell, forgetting it had been scheduled, granted the schoolbus driver's request for a day off on April 25. Hinojosa protested the cancellation, stating Covell already approved the trip and it was up to the administration to find another driver. Cummings replied there was another person qualified to drive the bus employed in the workshops and stated she would check into the possibility of assigning that person to drive the bus on April 25.

Hinojosa discussed the problem with another activities department employee, Ruri Pierre, and Pierre stated she could and would be willing to drive the bus, since she had done so on several previous occasions when it was necessary to transport students between the Center and various destinations.

When Hinojosa checked back with Cummings over the scheduled trip, Cummings informed her the trip still was off, she had not been able to make the necessary arrangements. Hinojosa suggested she contact Pierre, since Pierre could and would drive. Cummings told Hinojosa to forget about it, "the front office is in a bad mood."

[1] Read 1980 after all further date references omitting the year.

[2] I find at all pertinent times Covell and Cummings were supervisors and agents of the Association acting on its behalf within the meaning of Sec. 2 of the Act.

[3] Teachers and aides from the California school system also worked at the Center; the employees named above were full-time Association employees at the Center.

By the time Hinojosa had Cummings' final word, most of her class had gone home (at approximately 3:15 p.m.). Pierre and Gilmore joined Hinojosa in her classroom and Hinojosa voiced her frustration over her inability to proceed with the trip, the disappointment she anticipated among her students the following day, particularly since she had not been able to inform them of the cancellation before they left the Center that day, and her anger at the administration's handling of the matter. Gilmore stated he would talk to Covell. He left the other two, returned a short time later, and informed them that while he caught Covell in the parking lot, Covell proceeded to his car and drove off, refusing to discuss the matter, which angered Gilmore.

The three discussed the entire matter, their dissatisfaction with that and other administration actions, and decided to gather their associates. Within a short time Acosta, Dunkin, Fish, Hillman, Pickell, Sullivan, West, and Werwage arrived. Hinojosa, Gilmore, and Pierre informed them what happened. In the ensuing discussion, various staff members recounted grievances and complaints they had against the administration. The group finally agreed Fish would prepare a list of their grievances from notes she and Pickell took during the course of the meeting;[4] that Fish and Pierre[5] would present their grievances to Covell the following morning at the regular Friday morning staff meeting;[6] and that all those present other than Fish and Pierre would withhold their services beginning the following morning at 8 a.m. and gather instead at Pickell's home to demonstrate their solidarity and impress Covell with the seriousness of their grievances and the necessity to resolve those grievances in a manner satisfactory to the grievants.[7] It was also agreed that Fish or Pierre would telephone the assembled group at Pickell's home the following morning and advise them of Covell's reaction to the presentation of their grievances. The group did not consider or decide what they would do if the reaction was unsatisfactory.

By shortly after 8 a.m. on Friday, April 25, Covell and Cummings were aware that almost the entire activities staff were withholding their services that day, since most of the absentees telephoned the Center, spoke either to Covell or Cummings, and stated they would not be in (with some stating they were sick). When Cummings secured their time records to note the absences, she discovered they already were marked absent (with some marked "sick"), advised Covell of the markings, and observed the records must have been marked the previous day.[8]

When Covell and Cummings arrived for the staff meeting, Covell commented it looked like most of the activities staff were withholding their services to express their anger over the reduction scheduled for that day in the number of their assistants.[9] Pierre responded that was not the reason the activities staff was withholding their services that day, that she and Fish had been asked by the staff to present their reasons, and requested a meeting. Covell assented and he, Cummings, Fish, Pierre, Donna Rosenberg, and Muriel Collins proceeded to Cummings' office.[10] While the ensuing discussion was under way, Hillman arrived and joined the conference.[11] The conference began about 8:30 a.m. Fish followed the procedure of reading off a grievance from her list, adding her comments, soliciting the comments and views of the others present on the subject matter of that grievance, responding to those comments, etc. Both Fish and Covell were tense and at times spoke in raised voices. Fish was only part way through the list when Covell, noting the time and the presence of a large number of students on the grounds, stated it was getting close to starting time, he was going to have to cover the classes and workshops, and the meeting would have to continue at some other time.[12] At that time Fish advised Covell she could summon the strikers by telephone. Covell requested she do so, suggesting that the discussion of the grievances and complaints resume at a noon staff meeting. Pierre went to the telephone while Fish and Covell continued their discussion of the grievance before them. When Pickell answered the telephone, and while she and Pierre exchanged greetings, Pickell heard raised voices in the background; Pickell asked Pierre how it was going and Pierre responded it was not going well and advised Pickell to tell the group to come in to work. Pickell replied she would relay Pierre's advice to the group.

Following completion of Pierre's call, the Covell-Fish conference terminated and the participants went to their respective classrooms, workshops, and other duties.

[4] The notes included the following grievances: (1) cancellation of the April 25 field trip and management refusal to discuss the cancellation; (2) understaffing; (3) too heavy a workload; (4) inconsistency in pay scales; (5) overtime payments scheduling; (6) failure of management to communicate with staff re alleged budgetary limitations; (7) failure of management generally to communicate with staff re problems and attempt to resolve them; (8) providing the services of a nurse; etc.

[5] In an election conducted by Covell and Cummings the previous year, Fish was elected "staff representative" and Pierre was elected as her alternate. Fish and representatives similarly elected from the other three facilities operated by the Association met periodically with representatives of the executive director of the Association to discuss personnel and related problems.

[6] Covell regularly conducted a staff meeting each Friday morning between 8 and 8:45; the staff was scheduled to report for work at 8; the students arrived at the Center between 8:30 and 9; classes and workshops commenced at 9.

[7] Fish opposed this decision, favoring attendance of the entire group at the staff meeting the following morning and a presentation of the grievances at that time, but was overruled.

[8] Cummings was correct; Dunkin procured the time records of the group during the meeting the previous day, distributed them to the group, each member marked himself or herself absent for April 25 and in some cases inserted "sick" as the reason; and Dunkin returned the records to the office.

[9] Personnel from the adult education division of the California schools regularly assisted the staff in educating and training the students; their numbers were reduced on April 25.

[10] Rosenberg and Collins were on the workshops staff. Rosenberg was Fish's predecessor as elected staff representative and Fish thought the familiarity of the two with several of the matters set out in the grievances and their input at the conference would be helpful.

[11] While Hillman agreed to join the other members of the activities staff in withholding her services on April 25 and to join the others at Pickell's home that day, she changed her mind overnight and decided to report for and go to work.

[12] By doubling classes and assigning workshops staff to cover some of the classes in activities, all classes and workshops were manned without incident and without bringing in additional personnel.

By 10 a.m. the absentee activities staff had not come in. Both Covell and Cummings asked Fish why they were not in, Covell stating if they were not in by noon, action could be taken against them, including discharge.[13] Fish telephoned Pickell and asked why the staff had not come in, stating that their absence was putting her in a bad position, that Covell was going to take action against them (including possible discharge) if they were not in by noon, though everything was under control (all classes and workshops covered). Pickell's reply was evasive; she told Fish not to worry, the strikers were discussing strategy.

Following that conversation, Fish realized that the absentees no longer trusted or were willing to follow her lead; she subsequently advised Cummings she resigned as staff representative.

The strikers decided after prolonged discussions concerning the telephone calls and their position that, since they risked discipline whether or not they reported for work, they would continue on strike for the entire day, go in as a group their next scheduled workday (Monday, April 28), and demand Covell meet with them as a group and resolve their grievances prior to any return to work.

When Covell made contact with Farmer (on Saturday, April 26), Farmer gave Covell carte blanche concerning Association action against the employees who engaged in the Friday strike. Covell decided to discharge all the employees who engaged in the strike because, as he put it, "leaving the whole day without coming in and basically for—to get some attention for me to listen to some grievances, was not a valid thing."

The strikers never had an opportunity to present and attempt to resolve their grievances. When they arrived at the Center on April 28, they were instructed to report to Room 14. Prior to proceeding to that room, Fish notified the strikers she no longer could speak for them for she had resigned as staff representative. Fish and Pierre accompanied the strikers to Room 14, where Covell read a prepared statement wherein he accused the strikers of irresponsible conduct, stated he was deeply disturbed over their action, stated the staff manual set out a chain of command and procedures for the processing of grievances,[14] addressed some of the grievances on the list Fish gave him the preceding Friday,[15] and stated since the strikers chose strike action against the Association to pressure him into resolving their grievances to their satisfaction rather than reporting for work and processing their grievances through Cummings, etc., they were discharged. He closed with a direction to turn in all keys and other Association property, to gather all personal property, to be off the premises by 9 a.m., and not to reenter the premises unless and until they made an appointment with him. At the close of his statement, Pierre announced that, since she was part of the strike group and fully supported the strike, she resigned. Following the discharges and the resignation, only Fish, Hillman, and Jan Gilbert continued to work in the activities department.[16]

At a subsequent (May 1) meeting sought by the eight discharged and one resigned employee with Farmer[17] for the purpose of requesting reinstatement, Farmer not only rejected the request, he informed the nine they were finished in the field (educating and training the handicapped) within the area, since he had contacts with "everybody" and "word gets around fast."[18]

C. Analysis and Conclusions

When two or more employees withhold their services (strike) for the purpose of pressuring their employer into resolving to their satisfaction grievances over their rates of pay, wages, hours, or working conditions, they engage in "concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection" within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act and it is an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act for their employer "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce" (discharge) them for so engaging.[19]

The Association argues its discharge of the eight strikers did not violate the Act because: (1) they did not go on strike over work-related grievances; (2) their strike did not further any interest they had in resolving work-related grievances; (3) they were not seeking a specific remedy or result by virtue of their strike; and (4) their strike was unlawful, and/or improper and/or indefensible.

[13] Covell testified that the Association's executive director, Richard B. Farmer, had to authorize any disciplinary action before it could be effected and Farmer was out of town on April 25; he therefore had to defer taking any action until he contacted Farmer with his report and recommendations and secured Farmer's decision on what action would be taken.

[14] Referring to a provision of the manual stating, "If you have any questions, complaints or problems about your work or position with DWCAR, your point of view and the facts will be fairly and reasonably considered. You should first discuss the matter with your immediate supervisor (Cummings), you may then request a conference with the area director (Covell). . . . If the problem is not resolved to the satisfaction of the employee, he may request action from the Personnel Practices Committee. If still not resolved, action may be requested from the Board of Directors."

[15] Fish was requested to and surrendered the list of grievances before reporting to her assigned class on April 25. Covell, referring to the list, stated that the board was considering granting substantial pay raises—that he had requested budget increases to supply many items sought by the strikers—that he and the board were trying to secure more classroom space and money to improve present classrooms and relieve overcrowded conditions—that the four centers were budgeting for one-fourth of a nurse apiece so a nurse's services could be provided for the four centers—that he was trying to secure budget increases to alleviate their complaints over the constant increases in the number of students without corresponding increases in staff to handle them—that the executive director was seeking wages more comparable to the norm, the institution of a retirement plan and better health and dental plans—and that he would in the future make more of an effort to counsel with the staff and to resolve their grievances.

[16] Gilbert did not attend the employee grievance meeting of April 24 but did join the group at Pickell's home on April 25 and joined in their decision that day to remain on strike all day; Covell was unaware of the latter and stated at the hearing that he intended to confront Gilbert, ask her directly about the extent of her support of the strike, and, depending on her answer, decide what action was appropriate.

[17] I find at all pertinent times that Farmer was a supervisor and agent of the Association acting on its behalf within the meaning of Sec. 2 of the Act.

[18] The findings in this sec. B are based upon documentation and the testimony of Collins, Covell, Cummings, Fish, Hillman, Hinojosa, Pickell, and Pierre with any conflicts between the testimony of Hinojosa, Pickell, and Pierre and that of the other witnesses resolved by crediting the testimony of Hinojosa, Pickell, and Pierre, since their testimony was the more plausible, sincere, and creditable in the conflicting areas.

Findings have been entered that on April 24 the eight (plus Fish, Pierre, and Hillman) met after work on April 24 and developed a number of grievances for presentation to Covell the following morning at 8 a.m. Those grievances involved wages (inconsistent pay scales), hours (overtime payment, scheduling), and working conditions (understaffing; too heavy a workload; failure to advise re alleged budgetary limitations; failure to communicate with staff re problems and attempt to resolve them; arbitrary cancellation of a field trip and refusal to discuss reasons therefor; etc.).

I find the foregoing were work-related grievances.

The Association contends, assuming the above-recited matters were work-related grievances, that the strikers did not go on strike at 8 a.m. on April 25 to cause Covell to resolve those grievances to their satisfaction, but rather for the limited purpose of securing Covell's attention.

I reject the argument; certainly the strikers decided on April 24 to commence a strike on April 25 at 8 a.m. to secure his attention; but also to cause Covell to resolve those grievances to their satisfaction. I therefore find and conclude that the strikers went on strike at 8 a.m. to cause Covell to resolve their work-related grievances in a manner satisfactory to them; i.e., to further their interests vis-a-vis those grievances.

The Association next argues that, even if the strikers went on strike for the purpose of causing Covell to resolve work-related grievances to their satisfaction, from the time Covell stated his willingness to meet and discuss the grievances with them, their objective was accomplished and the strike thereafter became an individual decision by each striker to remain off work rather than risk discharge for making a false statement of his or her reason for withholding service (by calling in sick or placing the word "sick" on a time record) or for unauthorized absence (in view of Covell's comment that any employee who failed to report for work by noon risked discipline, including possible discharge), and thus was unprotected after that time.

I reject this contention. Findings have been entered that on April 24 the strikers agreed to go on strike at 8 a.m. on April 25, and to continue on strike until they received a report on Covell's reaction to the presentation of their grievances, without considering or deciding what they would do following receipt of that report; and that, after they received that report, they decided to continue on strike the balance of April 25 and until they learned Covell's reaction to their appearance en masse at the Center at 8 a.m. and demand for his consideration and resolution of their grievances in a manner satisfactory to them (a demand they never had the opportunity to make). It is undisputed that the strikers at their April 25 meeting discussed the fact that a number of them called in sick and marked their timecards as sick, that the appearance of those strikers at the Center that day would constitute an admission they were not ill, and that Covell might discipline them on that basis, but it is equally undisputed that other strikers did not call in sick nor mark themselves as sick and Covell was well aware they were out on strike and not sick,[20] and that, after such discussion, the strikers decided as a group to remain on strike at least until they heard Covell's April 28 response to their demand for resolution of their grievances.

On the basis of the foregoing, I find that all times on April the eight discharged employees were engaged in a strike for the purpose of causing the Association to resolve work-related grievances to their satisfaction.

In view of the foregoing, I find that the eight were seeking a remedy for their grievances of sufficient specificity within the meaning of the cases recited above (see fn. 19, particularly Shelly, where a strike for the purpose of causing the employer to negotiate earnestly was considered sufficient purpose for the strike).

Lastly, the Association contends that, even if the eight discharged employees went on strike for the purpose of achieving satisfactory resolution of work-related grievances, their conduct nevertheless was unprotected within the meaning of Sections 7 and 8(a)(1) of the Act because it was unlawful, and/or improper, and/or indefensible—arguing that alleged falsification of timecards, and/or failure to resort to established procedures for grievance resolution instead of striking, and/or alleged exposure of students and staff to "dangerous conditions" constituted such unlawful, and/or improper, and/or indefensible conduct.

The obvious answer to the first contention is that Covell did not discharge any of the eight for alleged falsification of a timecard. Both in his April 28 oral discharge notice and his accompanying written termination notices, Covell gave only one reason for discharge—seeking to resolve grievances through strike action rather than through established grievance procedures. It is further evident that not all of the eight employees discharged marked "sick" on their timecards (or called in "sick"). On the basis of the foregoing, I find and conclude that the entry by some of the eight of the word "sick" on their timecards (or calling in "sick") is irrelevant, since that entry and notice was not the reason for their discharge. I further find and conclude, in any event, that the entries and calls are insufficient basis for finding that those discharged employees who reported that their April 25 absences on strike were occasioned by illness thereby engaged in concerted activities unprotected by Section 7 and 8(a)(1) of the Act.

With regard to the election by the strikers to go on strike against the Association in an attempt to secure satisfactory resolution of their grievances rather than resorting to the procedure set out in the staff manual for the resolution of grievances, I find no authority for the premise that such election denies strikers the protections afforded by the Act; in fact, there is authority to the contrary.[21] A contrary holding would make a travesty of

[20] Covell termed the strike a "sickout" when Cummings pointed out how some of the strikers marked their timecards at 8 a.m. on April 25 and stated at the opening of the April 25 staff meeting that most of the activities staff apparently were on strike because of their dissatisfaction at the loss of services of personnel from Adult Education that day.

[21] See Washington Aluminum, supra, holding the existence of a rule prohibiting absences without permission without effect, and First National the protections afforded by Sections 7 and 8 of the Act, for an employer by the device of unilaterally establishing a procedure for the processing of employee grievances could effectively bar employees from resorting to direct economic action for their satisfactory resolution, a right guaranteed by the Act. I also note the procedure is permissive, not mandatory. I therefore find that, by engaging in direct, economic action to achieve a satisfactory resolution of their grievances rather than resorting to the grievance procedure unilaterally established by the Association for permissive resort thereto, the eight discharged employees did not engage in illegal, improper, or indefensible conduct depriving them of the protections afforded by Sections 7 and 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The Association next contends that, by engaging in the April 25 strike, the eight discharged employees subject the students and staff at the Center to "dangerous conditions" and thus removed themselves from the protection of the Act.

It is undisputed that all classes and workshops were manned by instructors or aides previously scheduled for work on April 25, without incident, and without calling in additional help. Thus, the short answer to this contention is that it is speculative without proof that the strikers created "dangerous conditions" by their absence, and proof that similar staff shortages in the past produced "dangerous conditions." I therefore find that the Association failed to establish that the eight striking employees subjected the students and staff to "dangerous conditions" warranting a finding that by striking against the Association on April 25 in an effort to secure satisfactory resolution of their work-related grievances they engaged in conduct unprotected by Sections 7 and 8 of the Act.

On the basis of the factual findings, analysis, and conclusions set out above, I find and conclude that on April 28 the Association violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging Acosta, Dunkin, Gilmore, Hinojosa, Pickell, Sullivan, West, and Werwage for engaging in a strike on April 25 for the purpose of causing the Association to resolve their work-related grievances in a manner satisfactory to them.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. At all pertinent times the Association was an employer engaged in commerce in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act.

2. At all pertinent times Farmer, Covell, and Cummings were supervisors and agents of the Association acting on its behalf within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act.

3. The Association violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging Acosta, Dunkin, Gilmore, Hinojosa, Pickell, Sullivan, West, and Werwage for engaging in a strike for the purpose of causing the Association to resolve their work-related grievances in a manner satisfactory to them.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practice affected commerce as defined in Section 2 of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Association engaged in an unfair labor practice in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I recommend that the Association be directed to cease and desist therefrom and to take affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act. Having found the Association discharged Acosta, Dunkin, Gilmore, Hinojosa, Pickell, Sullivan, West, and Werwage for engaging in concerted activities protected by the Act, I recommend that the Association be directed to offer Acosta, Dunkin, Gilmore, Hinojosa, Pickell, Sullivan, West, and Werwage reinstatement to their former positions, if necessary terminating any employees hired to replace them,[22] and to make them whole for any losses in wages or benefits they suffered by virtue of the discrimination against them, with the amounts due calculated in the manner set out in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and interest thereon computed in accordance with the formula set out in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

On the basis of the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I recommend the issuance of the following:

ORDER[23]

The Respondent, San Diego County Association for the Retarded, San Diego, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from disciplining its employees for engaging in a strike for the purpose of securing satisfactory resolution of their work-related grievances.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act:

(a) Offer to Robert Acosta, James Dunkin, David Gilmore, Aiko Hinojosa, Karen Pickell, Therese Sullivan, Genvieve West, and Warren Werwage reinstatement to their former positions, if necessary terminating any employees hired or assigned to replace them in those positions.

(b) Make whole Acosta, Dunkin, Gilmore, Hinojosa, Pickell, Sullivan, West, and Werwage in the manner set out in "The Remedy" section of this Decison.

Bank of Omaha, supra, holding the grievants had no duty to refrain from striking while giving their employer an opportunity to resolve their grievances.

[22] I reject the Association's contention the eight are barred from reinstatement by their participation in the preparation and circulation to parents of the students and the public of a letter on April 28, 1980, wherein they appealed to the parents and the public for support in their effort to resolve the work-related grievances which led to their strike and their discharges. Appeals by strikers to third parties for support concerning issues related to their dispute with their employer do not deprive strikers of reinstatement rights under the Act.

Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director for Region 21, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JENKINS, ZIMMERMAN, AND HUNTER

On August 7, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Bernard Ries issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Quick Find Co., St. Louis, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.

It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). DECISION

BERNARD RIES, Administrative Law Judge: These proceedings were consolidated for hearing by an order of the Regional Director for Region 14 issued on January 27, 1981. A hearing on the consolidated matters was held in St. Louis, Missouri, on February 5 and 6, 1981.

At issue is whether Respondent's agents violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by various statements made to employees in October, November, and December 1980, and January 1981, and by refusing to give them a bonus in December 1980; whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by terminating the employment of five employees on November 6, 1980; whether the ballots cast by four of those employees in an election held on January 9, 1981, should be opened and counted; whether another employee is a statutory supervisor; and whether there is substance to the Employer's objections to the election, which essentially claim that the election was tainted by the union activities of the asserted supervisory employee.

Briefs have been received from all parties.[1] On the basis of the entire record,[2] my recollection of the demeanor of the witnesses, and the briefs, I make the following findings of fact, conclusions of law,[3] and recommendations.

I. ESSENTIAL FACTS

Respondent manufactures storage chests for use on truck beds. It is a small concern, usually employing about eight production employees and one clerical employee. Its facility is located in a warehouse-style building which it shares with other businesses.

Dwight Gold started the business 10 years ago, and he remains its president. Until around July or August 1980, Gold had concerned himself with both sales and production functions; sometime in the summer of 1980,[4] Gold named Nathan Fogel, who had begun work for Gold as a salesman in May, to the newly created post of general manager, and Gold thereafter devoted himself more to sales. Other than these two men, there are and have been no managerial personnel.

The production employees signed authorization cards for the Union in October and, on October 22, the Union filed a petition for election with the Regional Office. The complaint alleges that Respondent thereafter engaged in a number of 8(a)(1) violations. On November 6, Respondent laid-off five of its seven full-time production employees, an action alleged to be violative of Section 8(a)(3). The Union filed an unfair labor practice charge on November 13. On December 18, Respondent wrote to the laid off employees, instructing them to return to work on December 26, and all save one did so. After a hearing in the representation case on December 3, an election was held on January 9, 1981. Of the seven ballots cast, five were challenged by Respondent, and the propriety of counting those ballots is an issue here.

[1] After the hearing closed, Respondent moved to reopen the record, attaching to the motion an affidavit alleging certain post-hearing criminal conduct by a witness for General Counsel. Although the motion to reopen was denied, Respondent's brief makes reference to the contents of the affidavit. Terming the allusion "grossly improper," General Counsel has filed a motion to strike Respondent's brief and, as well, to "excise from the file in this proceeding and deliver back to Respondent" the motion to reopen and the affidavit. While I share General Counsel's view of the impropriety of argument predicated on untested allegations, I see no point in engaging in the meaningless and ritualistic action sought by General Counsel. Obviously, I have ignored the affidavit to the extent of my capacity to do so.

[2] Errors in the transcript have been noted and corrected.

[3] The record establishes that it is appropriate for the Board to assert jurisdiction over Respondent, and that the Charging Party is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

[4] Unless otherwise specified, all dates hereafter refer to 1980.

259 NLRB No. 144

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Interrogation of Eugene Emily on October 23

The complaint alleges that, on October 23, Respondent's president, Gold, unlawfully interrogated an employee.

Eugene Emily testified that, on the day Gold received a copy of the election petition, Gold called him into the office and asked if he knew anything about the letter. Emily said that he did. Gold asked if he had signed a card. When Emily gave an affirmative reply, Gold said, "That's all I wanted to know." Gold acknowledged at hearing that the interview had occurred basically as alleged.

Several distinct legal issues in this case relate to Respondent's claim that Eugene Emily is a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Since Respondent would have been privileged, if Emily was a supervisor, to ask him whether he had signed a card, I shall turn now to the issue of Emily's status.

Emily began working for Respondent at some uncertain time, left employment, and then returned to work for Respondent again in 1976. As of October 1980, he was the most experienced of the seven full-time employees in the shop, the next most senior having been there for perhaps 3 years.

It is clear that, in a real sense, Emily was "in charge of" the production area, which is some 75–100 feet distant from the office and separated therefrom by the premises of another company. Before Fogel was appointed general manager around July 1980, no one, other than Gold, had occupied such a position. Before Fogel, Gold was often away from the plant attempting to market the product, and Emily was plainly the only one available to handle routine supervisory chores.

Gold testified, in fact, that a few years ago he left Emily in charge of the plant for 21 days. Emily testified that there were days, even when Gold was around, that the latter did not enter the production area. At one point, said Gold, he hired a man named Meyer as Emily's "assistant foreman," but Meyer and Emily did not get along, and when Emily "more or less" suggested that Meyer be dismissed, Gold fired him.[5] Fogel testified that, since becoming general manager, he has been away for weeks at a time, leaving Emily "in charge."

Gold testified that, before Fogel, he would screen applicants for employment and send on to Emily those who had passed: "If Emily didn't want them or didn't like them or didn't think he could do it, the employee was just sent away." Fogel testified that, since he had become general manager, 10–15 people have been fired and, on each occasion, after interviewing and selecting a number of attractive prospects, he has had Emily interview them and has then consulted with Emily for his opinion as to their acceptability: "He and I together will select one."[6]

Emily was not asked about his experience prior to Fogel's arrival but, when he was questioned as to occasions on which Fogel has consulted him about hiring, he said that Fogel had brought "a couple of guys out there," one whom he interviewed and the other whom he tested on the punch press as well. Respondent put in evidence four application forms. Two of them, dated June 14 and December 18, 1979, show that the applicants were "interviewed by" Emily (Gold is not mentioned); on a third, dated July 30, 1980, Emily's wife, who serves as the office secretary, wrote, "Looks good to me, Nate [Fogel] & Eugene"; and a fourth, dated August 5, 1980, says, "Eugene said would work out."[7]

It seems apparent that Gold has never comprehensively outlined to Emily the scope of his duties,[8] but his authority seems to have been inherent in the position, as he himself indicated by his actions. Emily conceded that he once warned employee Milton Kernebeck about his drinking but, asked if he had warned anyone else, Emily replied, "No, not for the company." However, employee Hoffman, testifying for General Counsel, said that Emily has "warned a few," and he specified an employee named Chester who was "warned" because he "fooled around with the spray gun." Emily's affidavit also states, "I do try to warn other employees about matters of safety or to keep working, but this is just so nobody gets hurt. "At the instant hearing, he amended this to read that he only tells employees to keep working "if a boss comes around."

Although Emily first testified that he had not recommended the discharge of any employee, he later conceded as truthful the statement in his affidavit that he "did suggest to Fogel that he let one man go," since the man was "on drugs and a danger to the rest of us." Fogel acquiesced in the suggestion, and he testified that he did so without further investigation. Gold further testified that the dismissal of employee Hedrick in 1979 came about because "Eugene suggested that we get rid of him. "Since Hedrick was evidently the "Chester" (see Resp.

[5] Employee Charles Hoffman effectively corroborated part of this testimony. His affidavit states that he himself "used to be leadman" (although he testified that no one ever told him that he was the leadman), but that "Dave Meyer took over" as leadman and was then discharged.

[6] In stating on brief, "Fogel acknowledged that upon occasion, he had rejected applicants for hire who Eugene Emily had recommended be hired." General Counsel mischaracterizes the evidence. Fogel testified that in the course of selecting from a pool of applicants already approved by Emily, their joint selection of one ex necessitate constituted "rejection" of others recommended by Emily.

[7] Where Emily's testimony conflicts with that of Gold or Fogel on this supervisory issue, I am not inclined to credit Emily. A reading of the transcript leads me to believe that Emily was of a mind to shape his testimony according to the needs of the case. He testified, for example, that before Fogel, "no one" was in charge if Gold was absent, a most unlikely state of affairs. While Emily answered negatively a question whether Gold had told him that it was his job "to catch the mistakes of the new employees," his pretrial affidavit states, "Gold has told me that it is my job to catch the mistakes of new people. "Again, Emily testified in the representation case hearing, "Well, I approved them to go home early. When they tell me they have to go home, why, I say, well, sure . . . . Then I go out and tell the supervising manager that he had to go home early." In his pretrial affidavit, he contrarily said, "If the bosses aren't present I can't let the men off, if the bosses are there, the men must see the bosses." But then at the hearing, he further contradicted his representation case testimony by answering "No" to the question whether the men "come to [him]" when they want to take off and no higher authority is present. Although Emily was a personally impressive witness, this sort of testimony seriously weakens his reliability.

[8] I note, however, as earlier brought out, the statement in Emily's affidavit that Gold told him it was his job "to catch the mistakes of the new employees." Emily said this happened in 1976.

Exh. 12) who was, according to Hoffman, warned by Emily for his behavior with the spray gun, Gold's testimony seems probable.

The record shows that Emily is primarily in charge of training new employees and gives them the required orientation. Gold further said that, before Fogel, the decision about whether to retain a probationary employee depended entirely on Emily's evaluation of him, and Fogel testified that he asks Emily periodically how new employees are working out and whether they should be kept on. Emily conceded that "sometimes" Fogel asks him how a new employee is getting along.

Emily spends most of his day at physical labor, primarily in operating a punch press. When he arrives in the morning, he evaluates the situation in order to determine the kind of parts which need to be manufactured, and they are accordingly fabricated. When a special unit needs to be built Fogel will tell Emily, and the latter will instruct the other employees.[9] If a part is needed, Emily will "sometimes" send an employee to the office to get it, and it is also Emily's responsibility to notify Fogel that supplies are needed. He further conceded that if he finds that "something is done incorrectly," he will bring it to the attention of the offending employee. While Emily testified that he moves employees from one job to another only if "they run out of work," Kernebeck testified that Emily "does have the power to move people around" to help make parts which are in short supply, and Kernebeck has seen him do so. Emily testified that when an employee runs out of work, "in order to keep them working, you know, I'll switch them to something else."

There are other indicia of supervisory rank. Emily earns $5.62 an hour; the other employees earn from $4 to $4.43. For the period of a year in which the timeclock was broken, Emily certified the hours worked by the employees on their timecards. According to Gold's uncontradicted testimony, Emily undertook, without instruction, to "cross-train" employees in functions other than the ones they were performing. His sense of management-oriented responsibility seems to be demonstrated by the fact that he once volunteered to work overtime for a week because they were "real low on stock."

It does seem reasonable to argue that the hiring of Fogel introduced an extra layer of supervision into the plant which would naturally have tended to diminish Emily's own position. But it appears from the record that, when Fogel took over, Gold spent less time at the business,[10] thus leaving Fogel to assume some of Gold's duties, and correspondingly less of Emily's than might be expected. Fogel testified that, on a normal day, he spends 30-45 minutes in the shop (apparently in a series of visits), and sometimes as much as an hour. That is not an inconsequential total period of time per day, and it might be contended that Fogel's daily presence suggests that Emily's supervisory authority is negligible.[11] Nonetheless, it appears to me that in many respects Fogel, continuing to be active in sales after becoming the general manager, relied upon Emily to oversee a production operation with which Fogel had no prior experience, and that, as shown above, Emily in fact regularly exercised recognized supervisory functions.[12]

The foregoing analysis leads me to believe that Emily is a "supervisor" within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. While not a high-ranking manager, Emily does appear to have the authority, "in the interest of the employer," to "transfer," to "assign," and "responsibly to direct" employees, and to "effectively . . . recommend such action[s]" as "hire" and "discharge." An employee who, inter alia, plays a vital part in the hiring process, who takes it upon himself to recommend that employees be discharged, who warns employees about their behavior, and who tells employees to stop doing one job and start upon another, possesses the authority contemplated by the statutory definition.

I further find that Gold did not violate the Act when he asked Emily about the letter on October 23. General Counsel argues, in the alternative, that even if Emily is a statutory supervisor, Gold's questioning would have tended to coerce Emily's wife, a statutory employee who was present at the time. The short answer is that if Gold was acting legitimately in interrogating Eugene Emily, that action could not have radiated an unlawful fallout on Susan Emily who, the law presumes, recognized the propriety of the questions put to her husband.[13] I therefore recommend dismissal of this allegation.

B. The Alleged November 7 Violation

Employee Milton (Bud) Kernebeck figures in most of the 8(a)(1) allegations.

Kernebeck worked for Respondent from 1974 to 1976, when he was discharged. He returned to work around February 1980, left in May, and then came back around August.

Kernebeck and Eugene Emily were the only full-time production employees not laid off on November 6.[14] On the morning of November 7, Kernebeck, Eugene Emily, and Susan Emily were in the production area when General Manager Fogel came in. The three employees gave generally congruent testimony as to the nature of the conversation which followed. In Kernebeck's words, Eugene asked Fogel why the employees had been laid off. Fogel said that Respondent's inventory was overstocked. Kernebeck asked if it had anything to do with the Union. Fogel asked what the main complaints of the employees were. Kernebeck named several items. Fogel commented, "I wish I'd have known something about this. Maybe I could have done something about it." Kernebeck replied, "Well, no matter what you can do, you're not going to stop the Union." More was said, which Kernebeck could not recall, and Fogel left, saying, "Well, let me see what I can do."

---

[9] Normally, however, it appears that the work is routine, and that employees require no particular instruction.

[10] Gold said that he is sometimes there no more than "10 minutes a week," and never "all day."

[11] I take note here of Fogel's testimony that he tries to be in the production area at the beginning of each workday, and that he once asked a group of employees, at 7:30 a.m., and in Emily's presence, why they were not working (thereafter, however, he asked Emily, "Why aren't your men working?").

[12] Since I conclude that the November layoff was motivated by unlawful considerations, it does not surprise me that Fogel did not consult with Emily, a known union supporter, about that decision.

[13] Gold testified, without contradiction, that not long before the hearing, Susan Emily had remarked to him that she "always thought [Eugene] was the foreman until [she] talked to the National Labor Relations Board lawyer."

[14] I put aside here Gold's brother, a Social Security pensioner who worked half-days.

Fogel remembered the conversation generally, but recalled no reference to the Union. He did, however, remember being told of the employee complaints and saying that he was "new as a manager there," that he had implemented a hospitalization program for the employees, and that he "would try and do things that would be better for the employees." He did "not recall" asking what grievances the employees had.

The complaint alleges that Fogel "solicited grievances from employees and impliedly promised to remedy those grievances in order to discourage employees' union organizational activities and/or union sympathies."

Although, as earlier noted, the testimony of the Emilys on this point is generally supportive of Kernebeck, there is one difference. The Emilys had Fogel saying only that he "wished we would have come to him first instead of going to the Union" (Eugene) or that "he wished that he had known, he could have done something about it" (Susan). This has a wistful, beyond-repair, connotation, arguably inconsistent with an implied promise to rectify wrongs. But Kernebeck testified that Fogel said, "Well, let me see what I can do," and Fogel himself recalled saying that he "would try and do things that would be better for the employees." Given this concession, and given my conclusion that, as the three employees testified, Fogel did solicit them to express their grievances,[15] I conclude that Fogel did indicate to the employees that Respondent would improve their employment conditions if they would withdraw their support of the Union, in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

C. The Alleged November 12 Violations

The complaint perceives four separate violations of the Act in a single conversation between Kernebeck and President Gold on November 12; it alleges that Gold unlawfully "interrogated" Kernebeck, informed him that employees "would not better their employment conditions," "threatened employees with loss of benefits," and "threatened to discharge employees."

Kernebeck said that, on November 12, Gold came into the plant area and called him away from working with Eugene Emily. Gold asked, "What's going on around here?" After some coy parrying, Gold said, "You know what I'm talking about, this Union. Did you join it?" When Kernebeck said he had, Gold then asked why he had not told him; Kernebeck spoke of a fear that Gold would have fired the lot of them. Gold then asked if Kernebeck planned to "stick with this," and the latter said that the employees were trying to better themselves. Gold told him, "Well, you're not going to better yourself, I guarantee it."

After further argument about whether certain employees were being treated fairly, Gold again asked if Kernebeck was going to "stick with this." Kernebeck indicated that likelihood. Gold then said, "You know, you were booked for a raise," and also said, "There was two guys that were definitely going to get fired, and you know who they are." After finally asking whether Kernebeck was "going to stick with this," Gold left.

Asked about an approach made by him to Kernebeck on November 12, Gold recalled a conversation in which Kernebeck had argued with him about the entitlement of certain employees to a vacation. He said that "[w]hen it came to the union business, he asked me about the thing and the question did arise as a result of one of his questions, are you going to stick with that?" Gold then said that Kernebeck "brought the union up," and that he did not "ask [Kernebeck] how he felt about the Union." Gold further agreed that there had been a conversation in which Kernebeck "was talking about the Union and I said two of those guys should have been fired."

Kernebeck is a convicted felon, and his convictions—for armed robbery and for concealing that prior conviction on a Federal form relating to the purchase of a shotgun—are relevant to his trustworthiness. Despite his checkered background, he was a most spontaneous and convincing witness. Gold, on the other hand, became less and less persuasive as his testimony went on. In this particular instance, for example, I find it very difficult to reconcile his admission that he asked Kernebeck whether he was "going to stick with" the Union with his denial that he asked Kernebeck "how he felt about the Union."

Eugene Emily, standing 20 feet away, testified that he overheard some of the conversation. As noted, Gold confirmed that he had a conversation or conversations in which he asked Kernebeck if he was going to "stick with" the Union and said that "two of those guys should have been fired." The record shows that Gold returned to this country from a long absence only the day before November 12, and it seems likely that he might have chosen that day to sound out Kernebeck. I conclude that the discussion between Gold and Kernebeck occurred as the latter says it did.

The persistent questioning about Kernebeck's union activities and intentions is, under Board law, violative. Gold's "guarantee" that Kernebeck would not "better himself" by resorting to the Union does, as General Counsel argues, unlawfully connote that such resort is a futile act. The comment that the employees "were booked for a raise" implies, without more, that benefits would be withheld because of the union activity.[16]

[15] Fogel made a pleasant personal appearance, but he only could "not recall" asking the employees what their complaints were, and in other respects his testimony seemed suspect. The three employees did not, I believe, fabricate this, and the course of the conversation would logically flow as the employees described it and as Fogel partially corroborated it.

[16] That Gold actually made such a statement is supported by his testimony at the hearing that "to be very frank with you, all of them were booked for a raise at that particular time, that's right, and then this occurred." On brief, General Counsel requests that, although the matter was not alleged, Respondent be found to have unlawfully withheld a previously scheduled wage increase. In my view, the question was not sufficiently litigated. Among other things, I have no idea what Gold meant by "booked," the size of the purported increase, or when such an increase would have become effective. Indeed, in view of Respondent's failure, due to business conditions, to pay employees their customary bonuses in 1980, as discussed hereafter, I very much doubt that a wage increase was more than a distant cloud on Gold's mental horizons, despite his testimonial assertion. In my view, Gold was simply attempting to put pressure on Kernebeck by this remark.

I disagree, however, with General Counsel's final contention that Gold's reference to "two guys that were definitely going to get fired" constitutes a "threat to discharge employees due to organizing activities." While the allusion did occur in a conversation linked to the union effort, this statement was not given a specific context by Kernebeck, and it does not fit easily into the conversation described by him. The remark very likely related to the November 6 layoff and to a claim by Gold that, even if there had been no layoff, two of the employees were destined for departure in any event. Since there is no showing that those two (whoever they might be) to whom Gold was referring played any prominent role in the organizing activity—indeed, the record shows that Emily and Kernebeck, the two employees not released on November 6, were the only employees at all instrumental in bringing in the Union—there is no basis for finding a threat to discharge employees because of their union affiliation.

D. The Alleged November 13 Violation

The complaint alleges that Gold unlawfully told an employee "that Respondent had delayed employees' efforts to be represented by Charging Party by causing the proceeding in Case 14–RC–9292 . . . to be blocked from processing."

A hearing on the petition was to be held on November 13. Gold appeared at the Regional Office as scheduled, but because the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge on November 13, based on the November 6 layoff, the hearing was not held.

Kernebeck testified that later on November 13, when he went to Gold's office to tell him something, Gold, with Fogel present, made reference to the fact that he had been at the Regional Office and said, "Well, we've got you blocked for a couple of weeks." Gold's testimony on this point is less than pellucid; he seemed to be saying that he did have a conversation with Kernebeck on November 13, but that is not at all clear. He denied, however, ever telling Kernebeck that the Union had been "blocked."

I do not believe that Kernebeck fabricated the essence of this unusual remark. On the other hand, it seems possible that Kernebeck misunderstood the import of what Gold was saying. Under routine procedure, the effect of the Union filing a charge was to "block" the processing of its own representation petition; it then apparently filed a waiver which allowed the election to proceed. Gold, a layman representing himself at the time, was probably told about that procedure by the Board agent assigned to the case. In turn, Gold probably told Kernebeck, also presumably a stranger to Board procedures, that the case had been "blocked," an arcane usage whose meaning likely escaped Kernebeck. There is no reason to think that Gold would have said that "we've got you blocked" when the blocking effect arose from the Union's own charge, a fact easily ascertainable by Kernebeck.

Moreover, even if Gold made the remark as testified by Kernebeck, I would doubt that it violated the Act. General Counsel regards it as analogous to cases where employers have expressed their "intent to delay Union representation through endless appeals," citing Two Guys Discount Department Stores, Inc., a wholly owned subsidiary of Vornado, Inc., 242 NLRB 1139, 1149 (1979). No such broad-gauged intention is indicated by the statement assertedly made by Gold.

E. The Alleged November 14 Violation

On or about November 14, Gold had a brief conversation with Susan Emily, his secretary. The complaint has parsed this conversation and analyzed it as containing three separate violations of the law, asserting that Gold "interrogated" Emily, "solicited grievances" from her, and "impliedly threatened to discharge employees."

Emily testified that Gold told her, on what she "believe[d]" was the day that he had had a meeting with the Labor Board, that "they had come out second."[17] He asked her if "we were going to go through with this," and she said she had nothing to do with it. Gold then inquired whether her husband intended to "go through with it." She said that he would and that, even if he wanted to back off, he would not do so, "because as soon as the Union would turn away, you would fire him." Gold then said, "Well, what can they do now." Emily replied, "Well, by what a Union guy has told him, they can't be fired for wanting a union in there." Perhaps at some point in this conversation, although Emily was not sure about that,[18] Gold said that he "couldn't see why the guys couldn't come and talk to him first. And, you know, see if they couldn't come up with something."

While Gold denied asking Emily if she was "going through with this" or how her husband "felt about it," he did seem to concede having had a conversation with her at least generally along the lines described by Emily.[19] Susan Emily was a most credible witness, and I believe her testimony.

The interrogation of Emily as to the future plans of the employees was a violation; I think; even though the question was inapplicable to Susan, who was excluded from the petitioned-for unit, it did inquire into the sentiments of the other employees ("if we were going to go through with this"). I think the Board would hold this to be coercive.

Abstractly, Gold's question, "Well, what can they do now," may be ambiguous, but I think the context reveals it to be threatening. Emily spoke of Eugene's concern that he would be subject to discharge by Gold if he abandoned the Union. Gold's response, "Well, what can they do now," intimates that he was telling her that "they" had no protection from discharge even with the shield of the Union, and Susan's reply to the remark suggests that she, too, thought that he was saying that he was free to fire the employees: "Well, by what a Union guy has told him, they can't be fired for wanting a union in there." I think Gold's statement amounts to a distinct, if implicit, threat that, as General Counsel puts it on brief, he "could fire the employees for their activities if he so chose." See General Iron Corp., 218 NLRB 770, 776 (1975).

[17] This suggests that the conversation occurred on November 13, not November 14 as alleged. Emily did not clarify who Gold intended to characterize as the "they" who had finished second.

[18] That might have been in the same conversation.

[19] To the question whether he asked her if Eugene and the others were going through with the effort and whether she had replied that Eugene would not back down for fear of being fired without union support, Gold replied, "I think that she mentioned that, I think that she strung up a conversation and did say that."

As set out, Gold also said that he "couldn't see why the guys couldn't come and talk to him first. And, you know, see if they couldn't come up with something."[20] I believe this was, as alleged, a solicitation of employee grievances, and that it did imply that those grievances would be remedied if the Union was abandoned. While the solicitation was not addressed to the direct concerns of the employee who heard it—a nonmember of the proposed bargaining unit—it does appear to be intended for transmission to those to whom it would be meaningful. I doubt that Gold was simply engaging in idle or uncalculating chatter. I suppose, rather, that his deliberate intention was to send a message to Susan's husband and the other employees that he would lend a willing ear to employee complaints if only, to use other words uttered by Gold, they would not "go through with this."

Accordingly, I find the three violations alleged in the complaint.

F. The Alleged December 22 Violations

The complaint alleges that Gold unlawfully interrogated an employee on December 22. Kernebeck testified that, on that date, Gold and Fogel came to his work location. Gold said, "You're back here all by yourself. We thought we'd come back and aggravate you for a while."

Gold then asked, "What's going on?" Kernebeck said he had heard nothing "since you guys went down to the Labor Board." Gold said that he thought Kernebeck did "know something" and that "You and Eugene both know what's going on." After referring to the forthcoming election, Gold asked, "Well, how are you going to go?" Kernebeck replied that he had already told them how he was "going to go." Somewhere along the line, Gold asked, "Who started this thing with the union?" Kernebeck told him that Eugene was the original instigator, but that he himself reactivated the effort after a hiatus.

Fogel recalled Kernebeck telling them that Eugene had originated the campaign, but said that that discussion took place in Fogel's office. Questioned at the hearing about an occasion on which Kernebeck was asked about the latest "scuttlebutt," Fogel had a "vague recollection" of a time when Gold made the comment "what's happening" to Kernebeck, after which "Mr. Kernebeck said, nothing, and we kept on walking." It would be surprising that a brief encounter could have been so memorable, unless it was less succinct than Fogel suggests. Gold, however, did "think" that he had a "conversation out in the plant with Kernebeck about the 22nd." In his recollection, however, Kernebeck "came to me and started talking Union." Nonetheless, he conceded that he asked, "Who started this thing,' and asked how Kernebeck "was going to vote with regard to the Union."

I credit Kernebeck's detailed account, as partially corroborated by Gold, that the two managers approached and questioned him, and I find that Respondent thereby engaged in impermissible interrogation, in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

The complaint alleges that,on December 22, Gold "advised an employee that this employee would not receive a bonus or a raise due to the union organizing"; and that, since that date, "Respondent has failed and refused to grant its employees a regularly scheduled Christmas bonus because the employees engaged in union and/or concerted protected activities."

Kernebeck said that, after the conversation with Gold and Fogel on December 22 set out above, Fogel later came into the shop again, at which time Kernebeck asked for his Christmas bonus. Fogel said his hands were tied, but that he thought it was "going to be delayed." He said he would ask Gold to speak to Kernebeck the next morning, however.

Gold followed up the next day, coming into the production area and telling Kernebeck that no bonuses would be given because "we haven't made enough money this year." Kernebeck argued that he thought he was "entitled to my bonus," and Gold replied, "Well, we do too. We want to give you a raise, but we can't because the NLRB will be on my ass." After a long discussion, Gold relented and then and there wrote Kernebeck a check for $50. When Kernebeck thanked him, Gold said, "You're welcome. I still don't know how you're going to go."

The testimony shows that, for the preceding several years, Gold had given his employees a bonus each July and December. The amount of the bonus was evidently discretionary with Gold. The evidence also shows that Gold had not paid the bonus in July of 1980, due, he said, to business conditions. In view of that circumstance, there is no reason to believe that he would have given all the employees a bonus in December, Union or no Union. Accordingly, I recommend dismissal of the allegation that the Christmas bonus was withheld due to union activities.

General Counsel's lengthy brief does not alternatively argue that the $50 payment to Kernebeck was an unlawful grant of benefit. It would seem to fall into that category. By giving Kernebeck $50 and saying, "I still don't know how you're going to go," Gold related the payment, which he at first had said he would not make, to Kernebeck's vote in the upcoming election.[21] The grant of such a benefit, in these circumstances, is a good example of the "fist inside the velvet glove" effect held by the Supreme Court in N.L.R.B. v. Exchange Parts Company, 375 U.S. 405, 409 (1964), to be the theoretical underpinning of the prohibition against awarding certain benefits. I believe that the issue was sufficiently litigated to permit a finding of violation here.

The complaint asserts that Kernebeck was unlawfully "advised . . . that . . . [he] would not receive a bonus or a raise due to the union organizing." As for the bonus, Kernebeck testified, as noted, that Gold ascribed his (initial) failure to pay a bonus to the fact that Respondent had not "made enough money this year." He did go on to say, however, "We want to give you a raise, but we can't because the NLRB will be on my ass."

[20] I have noted above that Susan Emily seemed unsure whether these particular comments were also made on November 13. Since they clearly did occur within the 10(b) period, the precise date is immaterial. Gold was not asked whether he had made such remarks to Susan.

[21] Gold conceded that he gave Kernebeck the money, and explained that he did so because Kernebeck "badgered" him.

I find no violation here. In the first place, there was, in point of fact, no demonstrated actual withholding. In view of Respondent's failure to pay bonuses in July and December, I do not believe that it had any real intention of giving a wage increase in the latter month, and I am certain that Kernebeck so appraised the situation.[22] Gold was simply engaging in puffing when he said that "[w]e want to give you a raise." Moreover, the explanation that no such raise could be given "because the NLRB will be on my ass" was, in the circumstances, a wholly realistic judgment of that portion of the corporate anatomy on which the Region might land if Respondent were to suddenly award a nonscheduled benefit just prior to an election. Gold did not attribute the failure to grant a raise to the fact that the employees were interested in the Union as such, nor did he imply that the outcome of the election would make a difference as to whether the employees would or would not receive an increase.

General Counsel cites the violation found in Pacific Southwest Airlines, 201 NLRB 647 (1973), where the employer summoned the employees to his office and "informed them that the promised wage increases would be canceled in view of the Union's demand for recognition, pointing out that the law did not permit the Company to provide higher wages or benefits which could persuade employees not to support the Union." In that case, however, the employees had been told only 5 days before (and prior to receipt of the union demand) that they would be receiving the increase. It is clear that the employer could have properly proceeded with the increase under controlling law, and that the Board reasonably inferred that the cancellation would be understood by the employees as "an act of retaliation for their continued adherence to the Union." Id. at 648.

The Board also said, in dicta, that in cases in which no violation has been found arising from a withholding of increased benefits, the mechanics and resolution of which have not been finally formulated . . . full explanation of the reasons for the withholding along with the assurance of future consideration of the withheld benefits, notwithstanding the outcome of the union's election campaign, serve to dissipate any assumption that the employees may or may not have that the union's presence is the sole obstacle to the ultimate realization of the promised benefits." Ibid. The Board did not say that such "full explanation" is a prerequisite to legality, and, in fact, in the case cited by the Board in its discussion, The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company, Inc., 192 NLRB 645 (1971), where no violation was found, the Board had specifically noted that "Respondent made no announcement to the employees that its policy had changed and that the employees would receive the raise regardless of how they voted in the election."

Here, Gold spoke to a single employee about a possible raise which, I am confident, that employee had no reason to believe had been under serious consideration. Gold did not lay at the Union's doorstep the blame for withholding the tenuous raise, but attributed the problem to a legal prohibition. I consider the remark considerably less offensive than those found by the Administrative Law Judges to be proper in C. P. & W. Printing Ink Company, Inc., 238 NLRB 1483, 1512 (1978) (speech to employees; the normal wage increases would not be given "because under the National Labor Relations laws it would be illegal for me to do so at this time while the Union election is pending. If I were to do so the Union would claim that I was trying to bribe you . . . . All I can tell you is that once the election is over one way or the other then something can be done") and Richard Tischler, et al., d/b/a Devon Gables Nursing Home et al., 237 NLRB 775, 787 (1978) (employees were told that "pay raises were at a standstill [because] of the Union's representation petition and that if the Union succeeded in representing the employees, their wages would be a matter for collective-bargaining negotiations"). These remarks might be said to contain "assurance of future consideration of withheld benefits"; to my mind, they can be construed as more ominous than assuring, and perhaps a good demonstration of why such "assurances" are better omitted altogether.

Accordingly, I recommend dismissal of this allegation.[23]

G. The November 6 Layoff

The complaint charges that when, "on or about November 6, 1980, Respondent laid off and/or terminated employees Michael Rangel, Joseph Emily, Charles Hoffman, Robert Moore and Donald Dilschneider," it violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. I find substance in the allegation.

The election petition, as earlier noted, was filed on October 22. On November 6, General Manager Fogel told Susan Emily that all the production employees, with the exception of Eugene Emily and Milton Kernebeck, were to be laid off that day.[24] After November 6, the latter two employees were put to work fabricating safety guards for the machinery, a measure evidently thought to be prudent as a result of an earlier OSHA investigation. Eugene Emily, however, also continued to perform production work, finishing up some incomplete units, during the first week after the layoff.[25]

A hearing in the representation case was held on December 3; the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election issued on December 12, setting an election for January 9. The complaint in this case issued on December 4.

[22] Gold testified that 1980 sales were down 24 percent from 1979.

[23] I have, nonetheless, found violative Gold's November 12 statement to Kernebeck, "You know, you were booked for a raise." The situations differ. In November, Kernebeck had not been informed that Respondent could not even afford to pay a bonus. Moreover, the open-ended November 12 statement strongly implies that future benefits would be withheld simply because of, and for no other reason than, the union activity.

[24] Gold's brother, a part-time worker, was also retained, according to the payrolls in evidence.

[25] G.C. Exh. 4, however, also shows that a substantial number of units were produced on November 25 and 26, and December 5, 9, 12, and 22, prior to the recall of the employees; this was apparently done by Kernebeck.

On December 18, the laid-off employees were recalled to work, effective December 26.

Respondent contends that the layoff was simply necessitated by an excessive stockpile of inventory. Gold, who left for Europe on Sunday, October 26, and did not return to this country until November 11, testified that before he left, and even before he received the petition, he told Fogel, "If you can't sell the merchandise and there is no place to put it, they are not working, just lay them off." Fogel testified that he thereafter decided to lay off the employees on November 6 because the space available for storing completed units was "totally used up" and the inventory was spilling into the aisles, and he thought it necessary to cease production until the inventory had been reduced by sales.

In his testimony, however, Fogel did not mention that Gold had given him any instructions in the matter before he left on his trip. Fogel's testimony, in fact, sounded as if he had received no instructions. Asked if he made the layoff decision himself, Fogel answered:

> THE WITNESS: There was a—no—well, I guess, yes, I did because there was no one available for me to talk to and I am referring to Mr. Gold. He was on a trip, on an extended trip and he wasn't available and so because of no space available I couldn't see where we would go if we were still manufacturing, so I laid them off.
> JUDGE RIES: Can you recall how many days prior to November 6 you first made that decision?
>
> THE WITNESS: It was on my mind for at least a week; for at least a week I did not consult with Susan or anything. It is just when I reached that point I just laid them off.
>
> JUDGE RIES: I see, and you did not consult with Mr. Gold about that?
> THE WITNESS: No, he was unreachable. To be specific he was out of the country.

There was plenty of opportunity here for Fogel to refer to Gold's prior instructions, but it appears that he deliberately chose not to do so, perhaps to insulate Gold from any role in the decision.

Of considerable importance to Respondent's case, and for different reasons, to General Counsel's, is the fact that once before in 1980 Respondent had also laid off its employees. In May, because of an inventory buildup, Respondent began reducing the hours of its production employees and, for a 5-week period, each employee worked from 1 to 4 days a week; not a week went by during this time in which each employee did not work at least 1 day.[26]

Employee Charles Hoffman, who counts the inventory of finished units each day, testified that, at the time of the May layoff, there were "[a]bout 150" units in stock.[27] While Gold, asked if he has ever had 150 pieces in inventory, answered, "I don't know of any," he also professed so scant a knowledge and recall of the circumstances surrounding the May layoff (e.g., as to the part he played in it, he "may have offered the suggestion to [Eugene Emily] or said something" about the need for laying the employees off) that there is no reason to discredit Hoffman.[28]

General Counsel's Exhibit 4 is a stipulated summary of Respondent's daily inventory and daily shipments (permitting, by deduction, calculation of each day's production) from July 7 through December 31.[29] It shows that, as of the morning of November 6, the inventory consisted of 125 units. It further shows that there had been a steady increase in the size of the inventory since July. In that month, the number of units on hand ranged in the 40's and 50's; in August, in the 60's and 70's; in September, it reached the 80's and 90's; in October, it started at 94 and hovered in the 120's; and for the days of November 3–6, the inventory showed, respectively, 118, 122, 125, and 125.

But the stock had been at 125 before November. It hit that figure on October 17 and again on Ocotber 20, went to 126 on October 22, was at 128 on October 24 (the day after Respondent's receipt of the election petition, and Gold's last day at the office before leaving for Europe), and had reached 130 on the morning of October 30.

Thus, when Fogel says that the storage space was "totally used up" and the inventory was spilling over into the aisles with 125 units on November 6, that intolerable state of affairs, and worse, had also been true on the mornings of October 17 (125), 20 (125), 22 (126), 24 (128), 27 (127), 29 (127), and 30 (130). And it is hard to imagine where Respondent had stowed the 150 units, representing 17 percent more inventory than on November 6, on hand when the May layoff, which was only a partial one, was instituted.

Although Fogel is inconsistent on the point, it seems to be implicit in his testimony that he delayed the layoff in the hope that a rash of sales would reduce the inventory; that is a not insensible position. But there was no particular reason, so far as the record shows, for Respondent to have expected a sudden and immediate sales surge as of October 17, when the unacceptable 125 figure was first reached, and no employee was laid off, any more than it might have anticipated one in early November. The evidence indicates that this is an unpredictable, day-to-day, business: orders apparently come in suddenly and without advance notice, and Respondent attempts to fill them immediately from stock, unless a special, customized order is received. If it were true that 125 units left Respondent "totally out of space" on November 6, that same problem certainly existed on October 17, and no persuasive reason presents itself for not having laid off employees on the earlier date, or even more urgently on any of the successive days on which the inventory reached or exceeded that figure; either there was enough space or there was not.[30]

---

[26] During this period, Eugene Emily was the only employee who continued to work full time.

[27] Unfortunately, Respondent's retained inventory records begin only with the July 1980 figures.

[28] I recognize, of course, that Hoffman stands to benefit from an unfair labor practice finding.

[29] Although Fogel at first testified that the "Total Daily Inventory" shown represents inventory at the end of the workday, he subsequently said that it depicts the inventory at the beginning of the day; the figures on the exhibit make clear that the latter statement is the accurate one.

The exhibit is plainly inaccurate in certain respects, and incomplete in others. For example, Respondent should show a greater daily inventory on December 3 than the 70 units indicated, since it began December 2 with 73 units and shipped out only 2 on that day. The numbers given for November 12 and 13 do not distinguish between the figures for each of those days; and there are no figures shown for certain days in the final 2 weeks of November.

In answer to the hypothetical question whether he would have laid the workers off if he had more room for inventory, Fogel replied, "It wouldn't have crossed my mind to lay them off at this time if there was room for storage." But since the record shows that Respondent had managed to accommodate 130 units on October 30 and 150 units in May, it seems reasonable to believe that it could not have been pushed to the hilt by 125 units on November 6.

Other evidence tends to create serious suspicion about Respondent's motive. Susan Emily testified that, soon after the layoff, Gold came to her and told her to cancel the shipment of two units for which she had already made shipping arrangements; he had never previously taken such an action.[31] She also said that Gold was holding on his desk orders for some two dozen units, also an unusual occurrence. While Gold denied that he had done so,[32] I believe Emily.[33] The fact that two extraordinary shipments of 16 and 19 units were made on November 25 and 26 (such a pattern—35 units shipped in 2 days—is not replicated during the period shown, although in July 34 units were sent in a 2-day period) indicates that units were, as Emily said, held back. It seems reasonable to suppose that Gold, who had only returned to the country on November 11, had some half-formed idea about padding the size of the inventory for a while,[34] but finally allowed his better judgment to get the best of him.

Susan Emily also testified that when, on November 6, Fogel told her that the men were to be laid off, he said, "Frankly, I was told to lay them off last week." Fogel testified that he believed he made a remark that he "should have had the layoff a week earlier." Susan Emily seemed quite believable but, since the two versions, while similar in structure, have quite different meanings, I am not inclined to rely upon what may have been a mistaken impression on Emily's part as to the intention behind Fogel's comment.

The most suspicious circumstance is the fact that, in contrast to May, when the employees had been permitted to work part time, until the inventory had been reduced, in November the layoff was total (except, of course, for the retention of Kernebeck and Eugene Emily). Fogel testified that he had been aware that the earlier layoff had been partial, and he said that he had "thought about . . . and discarded" the notion of using a similar system in November. His reasoning is opaque:

> Because it seemed to me that production would really suffer from that. You know, if we are going to have any kind of production and health and system there [sic], let the same two people, especially with the need for the safety guards and a welder, that to hire someone who cannot weld, I cannot have him making safety guards.

This seems to be an attempt to say that the need for the installation of safety guards had become so pressing that, to Fogel's mind, only those employees whose skills could contribute to the manufacture of such equipment could be retained until the job was done. Why there could not be both safety guard fabrication and regular production is not clear to me. Indeed, the record shows that, during the week following November 6, one of the retained employees continued to put the parts drawers together while the other made safety guards.

There was obviously no urgency about the installation of the guards. Fogel testified that he had anticipated installing them for "[a]t least a month to a month and a half" as a result of an OSHA investigation into an injury. On the other hand, his earlier noted testimony that "[i]t wouldn't have crossed my mind to lay them off at this time if there was room for storage" clearly shows that installation of the guards had no high priority.

But beyond this, if the only reason for not retaining all the employees on a part-time basis was, as Fogel seemed to be saying at this juncture, because he wanted to accomplish the safety work, it would seem that once that work was completed, he might then have been in a position to do what he had "thought about . . . and discarded." But although the guards had been finished at least by December 10, as indicated by Fogel's testimony, the men were not recalled until December 26.

The inventory exhibit shows that the stockpile dropped substantially after November 6. By December 5, it had fallen to 62 units, the lowest inventory Respondent had had on hand since August 11. The laid-off employees, however, were not recalled to work until December 26, 3 weeks later. As indicated, Fogel explained this by saying that December was anticipated to be a "slow month." This explanation, of course, directly conflicts with his other testimony that the layoff was solely due to lack of space, and that he would not have thought of laying off the employees "if there was room for storage." Surely, by the beginning of December, when the inventory dropped into the 70's, there was no question that there was sufficient "room for storage." And one would expect that in an inflationary economy, it makes some sense to produce now rather than later; if the inventory were to start to accumulate again, the employees could always be laid off again.

[30] Fogel, a newcomer to the trade, also testified that he anticipated no sales increase in December, traditionally a "slow" month. While that history may be true, and the following may be fortuitous, the figures for 1980 in this record show almost an exact parity of units shipped for September-October and November-December (respectively, 72–64, and 72–63). Gold could not "recall" ever having had a layoff in November or December prior to 1980.

[31] Emily was confused at the hearing about the time of this incident. Her pretrial affidavit, given on November 19, states that it occurred "about last Wednesday or Thursday or Friday, November 12–14."

[32] Gold's denial was less than surefooted. Asked if two dozen orders were held up, he replied, "I heard that yesterday too and not to my knowledge." That rather uncertain posture was strengthened when the question was asked again: "No way because I want to see them going out the door."

[33] The record shows that one unit was shipped out on November "12 & 13," but the exhibit does not show on which of those days it was shipped. The exhibit also shows a shipment on Friday, November 14; it reflects no figures at all relating to Monday, November 17, but it may arguably be deduced from the inventory figures for November 14 and 18 that no shipments were made on the November 17; two units were shipped on November 18, none on November 19, and one on November 20. Susan Emily testified that a customer inquiry during this period led Gold partially to rescind his order.

[34] The representation proceeding was scheduled for November 13.

Despite the new availability of storage space, the recall of the employees was long delayed.[35] The contrast between May and November is, thus, striking. In May, when the inventory had crept up to 150 units, Respondent had nonetheless been sufficiently considerate of its employees to permit all of them to continue working part time, obviously for the purposes of benefiting them personally and maintaining the crew intact. In November, after the advent of the Union, not only was the bulk of the work force totally severed from the payroll, but also no effort was made to retrieve them until long after the time at which, according to one branch of Fogel's thought process, it would have been appropriate to recall them—when there was "room for storage."

The evidence shows that Respondent has for years posted on a shop wall a set of plant rules. One of them reads, "Any employee off three days or more, unless on paid vacation is automatically removed from employees list. If they are allowed to return they return as a new employee." In composing the eligibility list for the January 9 election, Respondent omitted the five employees who had been laid off on November 6, claiming, as it still does, that the rule operated to render the five ineligible to vote, since they had been "automatically removed from employees list" as of the election eligibility date (which was "the payroll period ending immediately preceding the date of" the Regional Director's December 12 Decision and Direction of Election). On brief, General Counsel theorizes that "the true motivation for the timing of the layoff" was Respondent's intention to attempt to take advantage of this rule.

The argument appears to be substantial, although I am less than sure that Gold was trying to manipulate the initial layoff in accordance with any Board procedures known to him. The record indicates that at least as of December 11, when he filed an answer to the present complaint, Gold was still unrepresented by counsel; I doubt that he was cognizant of the eligibility date concept, as such, on November 6.

Nonetheless, it probably did seem likely to him around that period that employees who had not been working for him for some time might not be allowed to vote when and if an election was ultimately held, and that it would possibly work to his advantage to attempt to sever their connection with Respondent in the hope that Respondent's 3-day rule would be honored by the Board in the future. To the extent that it makes sense to draw a retroactive inference from later behavior, Respondent's subsequent insistence in the representation case, and here, that the employees lost their status by operation of the rule seems specious. As explained by Gold, the rule was evidently adopted in order to allow him to have a printed scapegoat to which he could point when an employee went on an unannounced absence and then returned several days later to find that a replacement had been hired; apparently, Gold felt more at ease having something in writing on which he could blame the employee's loss of a job. This situation, obviously, is a far cry from the case of an employee who has been involuntarily laid off and is awaiting recall to work.[36]
